In the novel, Orwell also explains that the war Oceania is fighting isn't a real war, but that it is a fabrication that needs to continuously be fought in order to destroy the fruits of society's labor, thus ensuring a continuous shortage of goods and maintain the social structure that the ruling elite has constructed.

Nineteen Eighty-Four remains one of the greatest novels of all time, and serves as a warning that seems to have been ignored about the road society is on. "George Orwell" was actually a pseudonym used by Eric Blair, who is the author of many books, including Animal Farm.

Games & Collector Cards

While some individuals have written fiction and non fiction books, documentary films, or Hollywood narratives incorporating the theme of the Illuminati, a small number of people have designed either card games or factual trading cards revolving around such topics. The makers intend the cards to be used and traded similar to baseball cards, and feature dozens of different cards consisting of a photo of Illuminati members or organizations on the front, and information about them on the back.

The Illuminati Card Game

A card game simply titled Illuminati was created in the early 1980s by a man named Steve Jackson who was inspired by Robert Anton Wilson's novels The Illuminatus! Trilogy The game consists of various secret societies competing for world domination through sinister means. It was designed as a tongue-in-cheek take on conspiracy theories.[195]

Jackson and his freelance designer had originally thought about designing the game around Robert Anton Wilson's Illuminatus! novels but decided against it due to the difficulties and expenses surrounding legal issues that would be involved, so they settled on making the game about the Illuminati.

Robert Shea, coauthor of The Illuminatus! Trilogy wrote an introduction to the rulebook for the Illuminati Expansion Set 1 (1983), which read, "Maybe the Illuminati are behind this game. They must be—they are, by definition, behind everything."

Despite Shea's support for the game, his coauthor Robert Anton Wilson criticized Jackson for exploiting the Illuminatus! name without paying royalties.

Steve Jackson's game company would go on to produce several versions of card games focusing on the Illuminati. In 1990, the company released a game titled The Illuminati—New World Order which consisted of various playing cards depicting Illuminati plans. Years later, after the 9/11 terrorist attacks of 2001, the game would be seen by some as predicting the future, and by others as having the game itself designed by the Illuminati.

Several of the cards that Jackson had designed depicted terrorist attacks eerily similar to those of 9/11. For example one card shows what looks like the World Trade Center's Twin Towers being blown up which is a card a player could use to gain points for the organizations they control. Another card labeled "Pentagon" shows the building being blown up and reads, "Each corporate group controlled by the Pentagon lets you draw one extra Plot card each turn." Another card is titled "Population Reduction"

Some see such cards as showing that the designer Steve Jackson was fairly informed about the Illuminati and the ideas that are spread surrounding their goals and operations. Others believe that the Illuminati were involved in the game's creation, and that Jackson himself was aware of the planned attacks years later on September 11th.

The story surrounding Steve Jackson and his Illuminati card game would take another interesting turn when his office was raided by the Secret Service in 1990 and some of his equipment was seized. A message posted on his website reads, "On the morning of March 1, [1990] without warning, a force of armed Secret Service agents—accompanied by Austin police and at least one civilian 'expert' from the phone company - occupied the offices of Steve Jackson Games and began to search for computer equipment. The home of Loyd Blankenship, the writer of GURPS Cyberpunk, was also raided. A large amount of equipment was seized, including four computers, two laser printers, some loose hard disks and a great deal of assorted hardware. One of the computers was the one running the Illuminati BBS."

The message goes on to say, "The company, "S.J. Games" fought back in court and finally won, but nearly went under financially. The investigation zeroed in on "fraud" supposedly committed by the company regarding the hacker activity and the fact that the company promoted the hacker's newsletter, "Phrack." However, this is so flimsy that it makes no common sense; in fact, the affidavit made so little sense that a Judge threw the case out, awarding S.J. Games $50,000 plus $250,000 attorney's fees."[196]

Of course some believe that Steve Jackson had been targeted by the Illuminati for using them as the central figure in his games. In reality, the Illuminati is probably pleased that Jackson did such a thing, because it fictionalizes them and causes people to think the Illuminati is nothing more than the name of a group of bad guys in a game. Steve Jackson's card game is also referenced in Dan Brown's novel Angels & Demons. (See Angels & Demons page 312)

New World Order Trading Cards

In 2008 a website was set up at www. NWOTradingCards.com which was the first of its kind to create trading cards similar to baseball cards, only covering issues surrounding the New World Order.

The designer's website explains, "NWO Trading Cards have arrived to assist you in your efforts to awaken the public. Each card is overflowing with hard hitting facts that will amaze truth seekers from all ranks. NWO Trading Cards are not playing cards; they are for trading, collecting and using as a tool to wake up the sleeping masses. NWO Trading Cards feature patriots, who fight for freedom against the New World Order, as well as those, who have chosen to align themselves with the globalists, pushing the New World Order ahead."

"NWO Trading Cards are perfect for any activist; you will hit the streets confident, armed with knowledge. And for those of us who are trying to wake up our friends and families, NWO Trading Cards are invaluable. Movies can be effective, but too many people refuse to watch, and even fewer will actually read an entire book. But NWO Trading Cards will expand your arsenal and rejuvenate your efforts."

"Inside of every pack are six NWO Trading Cards and one chance to win great prizes in our Big Chance Game. All cards are unique and some are rare, presenting a valuable collection. Our research team is dedicated to finding the truth and uncovering news blacked out by the Main Stream Media. Their work has been featured on Infowars.com, Rense, Prison Planet, We Are Change, What Really Happened, TruthNews.us, Jones Report, Illuminati Conspiracy Archive, Opednews, DavidIcke.com and many other great blogs and news sites. The team updates existing cards and adds new players regularly, keeping NWO Trading Cards current, and keeping you ahead of the game."

"Unlike mass produced trading cards, NWO Trading Cards is a quality product, hand crafted using only American made goods. Every pack is wrapped in the Constitution and sealed with red wax. All proceeds will be returned to the fight, send someone a wakeup call, or start your own collection today."

The card's designer sent this author (Mark Dice) a box containing over a dozen packs of cards and I was very impressed with their quality and design. Topics range from suspected Illuminati members to secret societies and New World Order organizations, as well as modern heroes who are working to expose them.

Conspiracy Cards

Another similar idea comes from the maker of Conspiracy Cards, although some of these cards cover topics that are considered on the fringe within some circles, including aliens and UFOs. The cards' designer had the intention of designing professional looking collector cards as a way to educate people about the Illuminati and the New World Order. These cards feature a photo of a person, organization, or issue on the front, and information about it on the back. The message on the website reads as follows: Greetings and welcome to ConspiracyCards.com

These factual cards are specifically designed with the intention of informing you about very important issues of which you may not be aware.

This vital information should be mainstream as some of the issues are a matter of life and death. But don't expect to see these topics discussed or debated in traditional media such as TV or newspapers.

Most all media sources are owned by very powerful groups who have no intention of divulging the truth.

Why?

…well we hope to clarify their agenda and explain their motive with these factual cards…

…that may just save your life.

Fictional Films

Some people think that Illuminati symbolism or themes in movies is the result of the organization flaunting their power and influence on the audience, or an attempt at mind control or subliminal signals. While this may sometimes be the case, it is far more frequent that the writers and producers of the films are very aware of the workings of the Illuminati, and are using their art form to tell the viewers about the nefarious activities of the Illuminati by using a narrative.

Some films clearly have storylines or activities that are based on actual people or events, but use different names, and others actually use the name of the Illuminati as the evil organization that the antagonist character or characters are working for.

In the following pages you will find just a sample of some of the most well-known films starring famous actors which have incorporated Illuminati activities into their plotlines. While some of the writers of such films have good intentions, fictional films incorporating the Illuminati or their activities are also used to fictionalize facts as a way of discrediting legitimate claims about the Illuminati and their activities.

By paralleling actual history or events, some films cause the public to believe that certain conspiracies or activities are the plot of a movie and when they are told about real events and agendas, they think the person trying to educate them has “seen too many movies.”

V for Vendetta

One of the most chilling fictional films which clearly reflects reality is V for Vendetta. It’s based on a comic book series written by Alan Moore and was released in theaters in 2006 after being produced by the Wachowski brothers, who also wrote the screenplay.

The plot revolves around a masked man simply known as “V” who is taking a stand against the fascist government of England which has fallen under the control of a dictator as a result of the War on Terror.

V begins his quest by taking over London’s television station and broadcasts his own message to the people in an attempt to get them to take a look at what has become of their country as a result of the war.

That message, in part is, “The truth is, there is something terribly wrong in this country isn’t there? Cruelty, and injustice, intolerance, and oppression…and where once you had the freedom to object…to think and speak as you saw fit, you now have sensors and systems of surveillance coercing your conformity and seducing your submission. I know you were afraid. Who wouldn’t be? War, terror, disease, there were a myriad of problems which conspired to corrupt your reason and rob you of your common sense. Fear got the best of you.”

He continues to say that he is going to blow up the Parliament building on November 5th to make a statement and deliver a symbolic blow against the government, and spark a revolution and an uprising of the people to take back their freedoms and eliminate the fascist dictatorship.

When the lead detective starts to uncover the truth about the war and what is motivating V, he says to another detective, “I see this chain of events…these coincidences…and I have to ask what if that isn’t what happened? If our own government was responsible for the deaths of over 100,000 people, would you really want to know?”

It turns out that elements within the government had released a plague in the recent past in order to spread chaos so they could increase their power and make a fortune from selling a vaccine.

The film has too many important messages to convey them in writing. It should be seen by everyone, and its principles absorbed by the viewer. However valid the film’s points are about the government being involved in terrorism and using fear to justify fascism, some elements in the movie must be seen with caution. There appears to be a subtle anti-Christian message woven into the plot. The fascist government, whose symbol represents a Christian cross, has outlawed the Koran, yet a popular preacher is seen on television daily who is obviously representing a Christian. Also in the film, a sub plot shows that the Christian fascist government has put all gays in jail.

If one can overlook these references, and see the larger message V for Vendetta is trying to make, then the film proves to be an entertaining, yet educational piece of work.

The Matrix

The popular Matrix trilogy has become a part of pop culture for its philosophical metaphor regarding knowledge and reality. The Wachowski brothers who directed it demonstrate an extensive knowledge of esoteric mysticism which becomes apparent in the film.

The premise of the first film, as many people are aware, is that the world in which we are living in and think is “the real world” is actually a computer generated hologram to keep us blind to the truth. In “reality” according to the film, human physical bodies are kept in pods and are used as bio generators to power The Matrix three dimensional hologram, thus making us prisoners who are unaware of our own captivity. When one is “unplugged” from the Matrix, then they can see and experience the true reality.

Aside from presenting this interesting philosophic view of reality, the film also includes multiple references to Christian theology, as well as the Illuminati. First of all, the main character “Neo” who is played by Keanu Reeves, is “the one” who is chosen to save the world, so he is basically portrayed as a messiah figure. The name “Neo” means “new” and he is symbolically “born again” when he is unplugged from the Matrix and experiences reality. He is actually called “my personal Jesus” by a character after Neo gives him a black market computer program. His love interest is named “Trinity” clearly referring the Christian Trinity of the three different forms that God has manifested himself in, being Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The city where the people staging a rebellion against the evil Matrix live in is called “Zion” a term that depicts the Land of Israel, or the Promised Land. The spaceship that the group uses is called the Nebakanezer, named after King Nebakanezer who ruled in Babylon and created the famous hanging gardens, which are considered one of the original seven wonders of the world.

In the sequel to The Matrix, titled The Matrix Reloaded, Neo and his crew are in search of "the Architect" of the Matrix, and hope to find out why it became a tool of deception and oppression. In their search they seek out the Keymaker who can help them gain access to parts of the Matrix. As it turns out, the Keymaker was being held captive by a man called Merovingian. In real life, this is the name of the supposed guardians of the Holy Grail, and the most powerful bloodline of the Illuminati. So it is interesting, to say the least, that the film depicts this man, Merovingian, as the corrupt keeper of the Keymaker, who can write computer programs that allow people to basically become gods in the Matrix. This is analogous to the Illuminati's possession of the Holy Grail, or their Luciferian doctrine, which allows them to be like gods on earth. Merovingian is also married to a woman named Persephone in the film. Persephone is the name of an ancient goddess said to be the Queen of the Underworld.

The Wachowski brothers demonstrate an extensive knowledge of esoteric symbolism, and are also the writers of the screenplay for V for Vendetta, which ties in false flag terrorism and fascism, so they clearly are informed as to what is really happening in the world.

Choosing such names as Merovingian, Persephone, Zion, and Trinity, are clearly not ordinary or random names, but were instead used to depict certain characteristics, many of which symbolically represent what the Illuminati does in real life.

Angels & Demons

In May 2009, the film version of Dan Brown's book Angels & Demons was released starring Tom Hanks. It is the prequel to The Da Vinci Code (2006), also a film adaptation of Brown's book of the same title. This is probably one of the works which has caused the greatest exposure of the Illuminati in modern history, but a closer look at the film's plot reveals damaging distortions and inaccuracies from the historical Illuminati.

A teaser trailer released in late 2008 showed an ambigram of the word "Illuminati" across the entire screen and cut to a frantic Tom Hanks who whispered, "It's the Illuminati." The plot of the film is that the ancient Illuminati has secretly survived since being exposed in the 18th century, and are now seeking revenge against the Vatican for suppressing them.

The film was directed by Ron Howard, produced by Brian Grazer, and the screenplay was written by Akiva Goldsman. For a more complete analysis of Dan Brown's take on the Illuminati, turn to page 312 in the Fictional Books section.

It must be made clear that this film, as well as The Da Vinci Code, and Brown's books of which these films are based off of, are not designed to educate the public about the Illuminati, or expose their nefarious activities. Their purpose is to introduce the public to a tainted and fictionalized version of the Illuminati which serves only to disarm the public by leading them to believe that the Illuminati is nothing more than a fictional group of bad guys, who have been invented by Hollywood.

The twist at the end of Angels & Demons the movie is that the Illuminati doesn't exist after all, and that the corrupt Camerlengo (Pope's assistant) was behind the threats to Vatican City to get people interested in religion again after he saves Vatican City from the very anti-matter bomb that he himself had placed on the property. This dramatic twist also reinforces the idea that the real Illuminati has been extinct for hundreds of years and conspiracy theorists' paranoid over-active imaginations lead them to believe that they still exist.

The Texas Chainsaw Massacre

The original Texas Chainsaw Massacre film, released in 1974, has spawned several sequels and prequels of a cannibalistic family in a remote region of Texas and is one of the most popular cult classic horror films.

In 1995 a version of the film was released titled The Texas Chainsaw Massacre: The Next Generation, which starred Renee Zellweger and Matthew McConaughey. On the surface, the film appears to be a typical slasher horror film about a group of four teenagers on prom night who end up getting in a car accident in the middle of nowhere. After being lured to a secluded old farmhouse, they are terrorized by Leatherface's family.

A few interesting things stick out if someone is familiar with the Illuminati and the kinds of things they are involved in. First of all, McConaughey's character, Vilmer, who is the bad guy in the film, drives a tow truck for a wrecking company, and in a brief shot, guess what the name of the towing company is that is printed on the truck's door? "Illuminati Wrecking."

Now this in and of itself wouldn't be that strange, but what comes later in the film clearly shows that the writer knew about the Illuminati and their activities.

There is a part in the film where McConaughey's girlfriend shows some sympathy for Zellweger as she is being held captive and tells her that Vilmer is not really a bad guy and that "he's just doing his job." She goes on to say that he works for the people you hear rumors about who really run the world, the kind of people who killed JFK. She also says that these people put a device in her head that would explode if she did not go along with what they wanted.

Later, at the end of the film, a well-dressed man arrives in a limo driven by a chauffeur and enters the house. He chastises Vilmer and tells him he wants the captors to "know the meaning of horror." He had a strange symbol burned into his chest. A few minutes later Zellweger narrowly escapes the murderous family and gets in the back of the limo. The man is seated inside and speaks with a European accent and is reading Le Figaro, which is one of the most popular newspapers in France. He then starts talking about how "all this" was supposed to be a "spiritual experience" and that he was striving for a sense of harmony. He then takes Zellweger to a hospital and the film ends.

In the credits the man's name is revealed simply as Rothman. Now, for those who don't know, the Rothschild family has been one of the most powerful Illuminati families for hundreds of years and lives in Europe. This man "Rothman" was obviously written into the script to represent a high level Illuminati member.

The film ends without giving the viewer an explanation of who Mr. Rothman is, or why he has shown up at the house or what his bizarre talk of a "spiritual experience" meant. The only logical conclusion is that this was one of the men Vilmer's girlfriend was referring to as the ones who she and her murderous boyfriend worked for. But what kind of work were they doing and why? Viewers not familiar with the Illuminati were completely confused and had no idea what to make of this. Others who noticed the Illuminati references thought that perhaps the Leatherface family were producing snuff films for the Illuminati. (See Snuff Films page 301)

During the course of my research for this book, I was able to contact the film's writer and producer, Kim Henkel, and on January 6th 2009 had a 31 minute and 13 second phone conversation with him about the film and his reasons for including references to the Illuminati. Henkel was a bit hesitant at first to give his reasons, and wanted the audience to draw their own conclusions, but as our conversation progressed, he slowly revealed some interesting insights.

Henkel revealed that others working on the film had urged him not to include the references to the Illuminati, and that they feared repercussions from the organization for doing so. Henkel included the references anyway and said that if the Illuminati in any form actually exists, he did not think they would be concerned with them.

Henkel did not appear to be very familiar with the Illuminati or its activities, but said he chose the term for the film as a symbolic reference to any clandestine or wealthy and powerful group who participates in criminal activity, or that exploit others for personal or professional gain.

Emphasizing not to take any one interpretation of the reference or the activities of the psycho family literally, he suggested as one possible interpretation that Mr. Rothman was perhaps purchasing human flesh from Vilmer, and that Rothman was in turn selling it to others who enjoyed eating it and were addicted to it. He also suggested that the victims needed to be terrorized and put in an intense state of fear before they were killed so that the meat would contain high levels of adrenaline and other hormones, which the individuals who consumed it found appealing and addictive.

While denying that the name for Mr. Rothman was inspired by the Rothschilds, Henkel did admit that he was familiar with the Rothschilds, and that they were rumored to be involved with the Illuminati. Many artists, including song writers and film directors, do not like to give their interpretation of their art because it can then influence or shatter the interpretation that others had made. I have a strong feeling that this is the case with Henkel's "hypothetical interpretation" of his film. At the end of our conversation when I asked him if there was anything else he would like to say about the film, he regretfully told me he had already said too much.

Teddy Bears' Picnic

Harry Shearer, the voice of Mr. Burns in the animated cartoon, The Simpsons, directed a comedy that he also had written which was based on the Bohemian Grove, titled Teddy Bears' Picnic. Shearer's film was released in 2002, just two years after Alex Jones had infiltrated the club and captured the Cremation of Care ritual on video. (See Dark Secrets: Inside Bohemian Grove page 269)

Shearer was interviewed by Jon Ronson for a segment in his Secret Rulers of the World series for the Trio Network where he admitted he had been a visitor to the Grove on one occasion and that, "you don't have to be a conspiracy theorist to know that this is a get together of very powerful guys. Whatever it is they're doing there, whether they're running the world or just reliving their adolescence, they're a self-selected group of powerful white Christian Americans. I love the theories, because I believe that these people are the only real good narrative writers left in the English language. They do write really good compelling narratives, but I just don't happen to think they're true. And they can keep you spellbound. And you can imagine, I'm in New York and they're keeping me spellbound. Imagine being isolated on a ranch in Montana with nobody except your son who you're teaching to shoot a rifle, this would be some amazing stuff coming through the night to you, you know. If you've ever been through a secret society in college, you know this stuff. Just add two zeros to the budget and you're doing what you did when you were eighteen years old."

[Ronson]: So it is a secret society, you think?

[Shearer]: Yeah but I mean it's a secret society the way the secret society that I was inducted into at UCLA in my senior year is a secret society. There is a lot of meaningless mumbo jumbo and the main conspiracy is to take it seriously.

In Shearer's film, the Bohemian Grove's Moloch statue is instead replaced with a large pelican. The human effigy, called "Care" by the club, is depicted as a neon clock in the film, and the members who dress up in red and black robes and participate in the ritual are depicted as men wearing Halloween-type witch costumes.

One of the plotlines in the film involves two employees of the club secretly videotaping the activities inside and exposing them, a plot clearly inspired by Alex Jones secretly videotaping the real Cremation of Care ritual in the year 2000.

Teddy Bears' Picnic was essentially a failure, and was released on DVD and not in theaters. Shearer's motivations for the film remain to be seen, but could have possibly been an attempt to discredit the claims of those who work to expose the Bohemian Grove and the powerful members who attend it.

The Brandon Corey Story

A fictional film produced to appear as a documentary called The Brandon Corey Story was actually believed to be a real documentary by some gullible viewers due to its extremely sophisticated production quality.

The production company TruthseekerTV, marketed their film as a real documentary investigating the disappearance of a man who was investigating the Illuminati. They had hoped it would land them a pilot for a television show based on conspiracies.

The producers are fans of David Icke, who is known for his bizarre claim that the inner circle of the Illuminati are a hybrid race that are half human, half alien, and thought that their marketing plan would be successful in spreading David Icke's message. (See David Icke page 212) While some gullible viewers believed the film was real, there was also a tremendous backlash of people calling the producers frauds and the film a hoax.

This caused them to release a statement saying, "For the record, the movie The Brandon Corey Story is fiction based on fact. Our goal was to try and get this seen by the millions of folks who might not otherwise have heard of David or listened to him. We felt that the best way to do this was to market this as real. We realize now that we should have made it completely clear that it was a movie."[197]

The film's budget must have been substantial and the producers are extremely talented. It is sad that such talent has went to waste on the "reptilian bloodline" theories of David Icke, when it could have been put to good use making films about fully factual and documentable information instead of poisoning the well with such films as The Brandon Corey Story, by mixing legitimate issues such as the Bohemian Grove, with reptilian shape shifters.

The Long Kiss Goodnight

A 1996 action thriller starring Samuel L. Jackson and Geena Davis called The Long Kiss Goodnight includes a chilling plotline involving false flag terrorism and mentions that the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center was allowed to happen by the government, when, in fact, it was. The Long Kiss Goodnight was directed by Renny Harlin and written by Shane Black, who also wrote the screenplay for Lethal Weapon.

In the film, a CIA operative (played by Craig Bierko) explains, “1993, World Trade Center bombing, remember? During the trial one of the bombers claimed the CIA had advanced knowledge. (laughing) Well, the diplomat who issued the terrorist Visa was CIA. It’s not unthinkable they paved the way for the bombing, purely to justify a budget increase.”

[Samuel L. Jackson’s character]

You’re telling me you’re going to fake some terrorist thing just to scare some money out of Congress?

[Craig Bierko’s character]

Well, unfortunately Mr. Henesy, I have no idea how to fake killing 4,000 people, so we’ll just have to do it for real. We’ll blame it on the Muslims, naturally. Then I’ll get my funding.

This element of The Long Kiss Goodnight is extremely significant because it not only includes corrupt elements in the CIA who orchestrated a terrorist attack to then blame it on Muslims, but it references an actual false flag attack, being the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. In the film, the CIA planned to detonate a chemical bomb in New York and blame Islamic terrorists.

Network

A popular 1976 film about the mainstream media that continues to reflect the reality of today is Network. The film is a drama about a struggling television network and a newscaster named Howard Beale whose ranting about society, the economy, and television itself causes the United Broadcasting System (UBC) to become a top rated network on TV.

The film contains several subplots including UBC producers becoming involved with a criminal Communist movement in order to get footage for a show about current events, but the main storyline revolves around Howard Beale becoming a television sensation for saying exactly what’s on his mind as he becomes the “mad prophet” of the airwaves. The film was responsible for the phrase “I’m as mad as Hell and I’m not going to take this anymore!”

entering the pop culture lexicon. A transcript of Beale's most powerful rants follows, which he begins by telling the audience that the Chairman of the Board of UBC just died.

[Howard Beale]

So. A rich little man with white hair died. What has that got to do with the price of rice, right? And why is that woe to us? Because you people, and sixty-two million other Americans, are listening to me right now. Because less than three percent of you people read books! Because less than fifteen percent of you read newspapers! Because the only truth you know is what you get over this tube. Right now, there is a whole, an entire generation that never knew anything that didn't come out of this tube!

This tube is the Gospel, the ultimate revelation. This tube can make or break presidents, popes, prime ministers... This tube is the most awesome God-damned force in the whole godless world, and woe is us if it ever falls in to the hands of the wrong people, and that's why woe is us that Edward George Ruddy died. Because this company is now in the hands of CCA—the Communication Corporation of America. There's a new Chairman of the Board, a man called Frank Hackett, sitting in Mr. Ruddy's office on the twentieth floor. And when the twelfth largest company in the world controls the most awesome God-damned propaganda force in the whole godless world, who knows what shit will be peddled for truth on this network?

[Howard Beale]

[ascending the stage] So, you listen to me. Listen to me: Television is not the truth! Television is a God-damned amusement park! Television is a circus, a carnival, a traveling troupe of acrobats, storytellers, dancers, singers, jugglers, side-show freaks, lion tamers, and football players. We're in the boredom-killing business! So if you want the truth... Go to God! Go to your gurus! Go to yourselves! Because that's the only place you're ever going to find any real truth.

[Howard Beale]

[laughing to himself] But, man, you're never going to get any truth from us. We'll tell you anything you want to hear; we lie like hell. You're beginning to believe the illusions we're spinning here. You're beginning to think that the tube is reality, and that your own lives are unreal. You do whatever the tube tells you! You dress like the tube, you eat like the tube, you raise your children like the tube, you even think like the tube! This is mass madness, you maniacs! In God's name, you people are the real thing! WE are the illusion! So turn off your television sets. Turn them off now. Turn them off right now. Turn them off and leave them off! Turn them off right in the middle of the sentence I'm speaking to you now! TURN THEM OFF...

[collapses in a prophetic swoon as the audience erupts in thunderous applause]

END OF TRANSCRIPT EXCERPT

Beale's ranting eventually gets him in trouble with the network because he is giving the public too much information instead of keeping them entertained and out of the elite's way. This epic scene consists of the chairman of the company that owns UBC yelling at the top of his lungs that there are no more countries, there are only corporations and unleashed his anger saying, "You have meddled with the primal forces of Nature, Mr. Beale! And I won't have it! Is that clear?"

The film concludes with the UBC network executives planning Beale's murder to shut him up and he is later shot while doing a live broadcast by members of the Communist group that the network had been working with in the production of their show. It seems the ranting of the "mad prophet" fell on deaf ears, because since the film's release back in 1976, society has become completely mesmerized by television and it has increased its monopoly regarding the control of information. (See Mainstream Media page 33)

Star Wars

Nearly everyone in the world is familiar with the Star Wars films and the epic tales of good vs. evil that are woven into the storylines. In 2005 when Episode III: Revenge of the Sith was released in theaters, it contained a pivotal storyline which had such a resemblance to current affairs that large numbers of people saw the movie as a deliberate political statement regarding the Bush administration and the War on Terror.

In the film as the storyline unfolds it becomes clear that Chancellor Palpatine, who is the head of the Republic, is secretly working for the Dark Side and orchestrating events that will be used to justify eliminating laws which limit his power, allowing him to transform the Republic into an Empire, with him as the dictator. As he is announcing this transformation, Queen Padme (played by Natalie Portman) says, “So this is how liberty dies, with thunderous applause…”

The striking resemblance to the Bush administration using the threat of terrorism to pass the Patriot Act and eliminate valuable civil liberties that are outlined in the Constitution shows that George Lucas is very well aware of the tactics of dictators. There are also parallels between Chancellor Palpatine pretending to support the Jedi (the good guys) and democracy, just as George W. Bush pretended to be a Christian and support conservative ideologies. And, as it turns out in the film, Chancellor Palpatine actually is working with the evil Sith, just as George W. Bush is a member of Skull and Bones and one of the most willing servants of the Illuminati to ever hold the office of the president of the United States.

Lara Croft: Tomb Raider

In 2001 Angelina Jolie starred in the film adaptation of the video game Tomb Raider, which featured a plotline mentioning the Illuminati by name and depicted them as an evil power hungry organization that was after a special ancient artifact called the Triangle of Light that was believed to give whoever possessed it the power of God and the ability to manipulate time.

The Triangle of Light was broken into two halves and hidden on opposite sides of the earth in an attempt to prevent anyone from joining them together and harnessing its power. It was said that the power could be used for good or evil, and after it was abused in ancient times, the object was deemed too dangerous for anyone to use and it was hidden away. This Triangle of Light consisted of a metal pyramid with an all seeing eye in the center. Lara Croft's (Jolie's) father had told his daughter that it was her destiny to find the Triangle and destroy it before the Illuminati was able to find it. It turns out her father (played by Jon Voight, her father in real life ironically) was a member of the Illuminati and realized they were evil and had secretly planned to have his daughter find the object to prevent them from becoming all powerful.

Besides an abundance of Illuminati references and symbols, another interesting aspect to the film was that according the legend, the Triangle of Light could only be activated every 5,000 years when all nine planets in the solar system were aligned with each other. This is similar to the planetary alignment that will occur on December 21st 2012 which some mystics believe will mark the transformation of the earth into a New Age or possibly mark the birth or appearance of the New Age Christ. The screenplay for Lara Croft: Tomb Raider was written by Patrick Massett and John Zinman.

They Live

John Carpenter wrote a screenplay using the pseudonym "Frank Armitage" and then directed the 1988 science fiction film titled They Live which starred actor Rowdy Roddy Piper.

In the film, the economy is in shambles and tent cities are found throughout the country while the ruling class continues to maintain an abundant lifestyle. The plot follows Piper's character as he struggles to find work and discovers that a group of men at a tent city he is living at have discovered a secret as to the true identity of the ruling class, and their method of controlling the population.

In the beginning of the film as Piper wanders the streets looking for work he comes across a street preacher who gets hauled away by the police after delivering a message about the evils of society and how the people in power were feeding off of the less fortunate. One notable scene involves a group of hackers who illegally broadcast a brief message on the television in an attempt to inform people about why society is the way it is. A partial transcript of that pirate broadcast follows:

"Our impulses are being redirected. We are living in an artificially-induced state of consciousness that resembles sleep. The poor and the under-class is growing, racial justice and human rights are non-existent. They have created a repressive society and we are their unwitting accomplices. Their intention to rule rests with the annihilation of consciousness."

"We have been lulled into a trance. They have made us indifferent to ourselves, to others…we are focused only on our own gain. Please understand, they are safe as long as they are not discovered. That is their primary method of survival. Keep us asleep, keep us selfish, keep us sedated. We are their cattle. We are being bred for slavery."

Carpenter seemed to understand how the elite manage the population and there were numerous references to materialism and social ignorance in the film. While not exactly a blockbuster, They Live was well received among Rowdy Roddy Piper fans, who enjoyed the actor's rare appearance on the silver screen after building his career as a professional wrestler.

Hackers

A 1995 film that failed at the box office but developed a cult following in the underground community of hackers was the film titled Hackers. It starred Jonny Lee Miller and Angelina Jolie, and was written by Rafael Moreu.

The plotline involves a rivalry between groups of hackers, but there is a scene that stuck out to those aware of the New World Order when Eugene "The Plague" Belford (played by Fisher Stevens) sent a laptop containing a video message to a fellow hacker "Zero Cool" (played by Jonny Lee Miller). The message was, "You wanted to know who I am Zero Cool. Well let me explain the New World Order. Governments and corporations need people like you and me. We are samurai. The keyboard cowboys, and all those other people out there who have no idea what's going on are the cattle. Moooo. I need your help. You need my help. let me help you earn your spurs. Think about it."

The Skulls

In the year 2000 a film called The Skulls was released in theaters that was clearly based on the Skull and Bones society at Yale. The plot in the film actually involves a fraternity at Yale University, called the Skulls, which is an elite invitation only secret society. The film stars Joshua Jackson, Paul Walker, and Leslie Bibb and was written by John Pogue. In 2002 The Skulls 2 was released on video, and later in 2004, The Skulls III was produced as a direct to video release as well.

The Skulls plot focuses on the murder and ensuing cover-up of a student journalist who broke into the Skulls' clubhouse to take pictures and gather information for a story he was working on. In the film it is revealed that senators and judges are members of the Skulls and it is made clear that they have police and University officials under their control, primarily through blackmail. (See America's Secret Establishment page 85) (See Fleshing out Skull and Bones page 88)

The Good Shepherd

The Good Shepherd is a fictional film which claims to tell the story about the creation of the CIA. Since the Central Intelligence Agency was created by members of the Skull and Bones society at Yale University, the film includes several scenes showing Bonesmen involved in this process, but inaccurately portrays their motives for doing so. The film was released in 2006 and stars Matt Damon and Angelina Jolie.

Damon portrays Edward Wilson who is based on James Jesus Angelton and Richard M. Bissell. Wilson (Damon) is asked to join Skull and Bones and the film shows an initiation ritual which is surprisingly accurate. A man wearing a black robe and dressed like the Grim Reaper tells the newly chosen members that they have been picked to become part of America's most powerful secret society, and brags that their membership has included a president, vice presidents, supreme court justices, congressmen and senators. The new recruits then lay nude in a coffin and tell the group all the secrets about their life that they've never told anyone before. (This is something that new members of Skull and Bones actually do.)

The film was written by Eric Roth, who also wrote the screenplay for The Insider (1999), the true story of the 60 Minutes exposé of the tobacco companies, and Munich (2005) a historical film about Israel's secret retaliation of the murders of Israeli Olympic athletes in 1972.

The Good Shepherd depicts the men involved in creating the CIA as men concerned with and looking out for America during World War II and the Cold War, when in reality their sole purpose was to create a covert network that would aid in the construction of the New World Order, and provide those involved the cover and protection of "national security" for their operations. Throughout the film, the Skull and Bones society is painted as a group of patriotic Americans who sing choir songs and all say a prayer before dinner at their banquets on Deer Island.

It is advised that one watch a Dutch documentary titled Skull & Bones for an accurate history of the secret society. This film may be found on Google Video and starts out with a Dutch narrator for a minute or more, but then the rest of the film is in English. The Good Shepherd is a long and boring film, and can be added to the list of Illuminati whitewashing propaganda pieces which serve the purpose of tainting the facts to cover their dark past.

The Lord of the Rings

J.R.R. Tolkien's famous literary series, The Lord of the Rings was adapted to screenplays of which the first of the trilogy, The Fellowship of the Ring was released in 2001 starring Elija Wood and was directed by Peter Jackson.

The plot revolves around a hobbit (a fictional race of human-like beings) named Frodo Baggins (Elija Wood) who is trusted with the task of taking an ancient magical ring to a volcano called Mount Doom and throwing it in the lava to destroy it so it will not fall into the wrong hands. The films are amazing and visually stunning, but there are several aspects which stick out that ring of Illuminati overtones.

The first is the magical ring itself. According to the film (and the books) whoever wears the master ring will have supernatural powers beyond what anyone could imagine. Despite the good nature of anyone's heart, including Frodo Baggins, the power of the ring brings out the most selfish and corrupt nature of whoever has it. It seems that nobody is able to maintain their morality when given the power of the ring, which is why Baggins and his crew set out to destroy it. It is quite analogous to political power and Lord Acton's dictum "power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely." One interpretation is that if the source of the Illuminati's power is benign, that simply having the power will lead them to use it in self-serving and abusive ways.

Another, perhaps more interesting use of symbolism in the story is that of the Eye of Sauron. In the film, the evil ruler Sauron has sent his army out to find the ring so he may become invincible. But what is interesting is that a huge tower stands outside of his castle and contains one eye perched at the very top which can watch over the entire land and see everything, including sensing the location of the ring. This is quite a clear reference to the all seeing eye of the Illuminati that appears on top of the pyramid found on the back of the one dollar bill.

J.R.R. Tolkien's writings revolved around the forces of good and evil, and it is possible that he was aware of the Illuminati and their symbols, and incorporated them into his writings. Tolkien died on September 2nd 1973 at the age of 81.

Eyes Wide Shut

The bizarre 1999 film Eyes Wide Shut starring Tom Cruise and Nicole Kidman left the audience and critics alike confused, and some disappointed.

The film was Stanly Kubrick's last production before he died and was inspired supposedly by a short book by Arthur Schnitlzer titled Dream Story.

In the film, Tom Cruise's charter (Dr. Bill Hartford) discovers that a secret group of wealthy men and women meet periodically in large mansions near New York City while wearing black robes and masks and participate in strange ceremonies and orgies.

Cruise obtains a black robe and a mask, and attends a party out of curiosity. He was only allowed in because a friend of his who played the piano at the parties had given him the secret password. At one point he is discovered while inside the mansion and it is clear that he is an uninvited guest. Before he is told of his punishment, a woman comes forward and asks that she be punished in his place. Days later he finds out the identity of the woman, and that she has turned up dead, leading him to believe that the group of masked partygoers killed her, as they were going to do with him before she volunteered to accept his punishment.

Some believe that the film was originally intended to depict the group of masked partygoers as a wealthy cult who sacrificed people and drank their blood while having an orgy, but that due to pressure, the screenplay was altered. One also can't help but be reminded of the Bohemian Grove ceremonies when watching the film, and others see the storyline as a reference to actual Illuminati parties involving sexual orgies and human sacrifices and even necrophilia.

The Brotherhood of the Bell

A 1970 film titled The Brotherhood of the Bell depicts a college fraternity which acts as a recruiting ground for a criminal banking and business network involving the country's most successful men. The film was clearly a reference to the Skull and Bones society at Yale University. It was written by David Karp and directed by Paul Wendkos and nominated by the Directors Guild of America for outstanding directorial achievement in television.

After being sworn into the Brotherhood of the Bell, one of the initiates has a brief conversation with an elder of the organization who had attended the ceremony and joyfully says, “I’m a member of the establishment now,” when the elder corrects him, “Not a part. The establishment.”

The plotline involves an economics professor named Dr. Andrew Patterson (played by Glenn Ford) who receives a call from the group twenty years after joining, and is reminded of the oath he once took to follow any order regardless of what it was when given by the brotherhood, and his time to serve had come. He was told he needed to murder someone, and when he refuses, his entire life is turned upside down and the true power and reach of the brotherhood becomes apparent to him.

A Scanner Darkly

Keanu Reeves, Woody Harrelson, Robert Downey Jr., and Winona Ryder star in A Scanner Darkly, which was based on the 1977 science fiction novel by Philip K. Dick about a future dystopia in Orange County, California. The film was released in 2006 and is directed by Richard Linklater who also produced Waking Life and Dazed and Confused.

A Scanner Darkly was shot using real actors and then animated using a process called rotoscoping which gives it a very unique appearance of being a cartoon like animation. In the film, it is discovered that a drug rehabilitation center called New Way is funding the police department’s investigations into the wide spread abuse of a drug called Substance D, but are secretly producing the drugs and forcing individuals enrolled in their rehabilitation program to cultivate the flowers used to create the drug. Anyone who is familiar with the real cause of the crack-cocaine boom in the 1980s can see that the film is making a statement about the CIA’s major role in importing drugs into the United States.

The film included a brief cameo from Alex Jones and showed him standing on the street with a megaphone trying to inform people what was happening, and is quickly hauled away by police. One also can’t help but notice the Illuminati’s all-seeing eye on the shirt worn by Robert Downy Jr.’s character. The fact that the director chose this as the character’s wardrobe and included Alex Jones with his signature bullhorn, proves that this was no ordinary film. Clearly Richard Linklater was trying to make a statement with his film, as opposed to simply making an entertaining movie.

National Treasure

One of the films to bring Freemasonry and the topic of secret societies and their symbols into the public's awareness is National Treasure starring Nicolas Cage. The film was produce by Walt Disney Pictures and is about a lost treasure that the Freemasons and Knights Templar have hidden. While the film may be a family friendly adventure full of various twists and turns and clues and mysteries, it serves to whitewash the true history of the Knights Templars, the Freemasons, and the treasure from Solomon's Temple.

National Treasure basically paints the Freemasons as the good guys, who have had to protect their sacred treasure from pirates and criminals. In reality, the Knights Templar were the pirates and thieves who became the first international bankers, and later evolved into Freemasonry and the Illuminati. The story was written by a team of writers consisting of Jim Kouf, Oren Aviv, Charles Segars, Ted Elliott, and Terry Rossio. The screenplay was then written by a husband and wife team named Marianne and Cormac Wibberlev.

Shooter

Mark Wahlberg plays a Marine Corps Scout Sniper who is framed for an assassination by the CIA in Shooter which was released in 2007. In the beginning of the film, Wahlberg's character sits down at a computer to check the morning news and says to himself "let's see what lies they're feeding us today" as a copy of the 9/11 Commission Report sits next to the keyboard.

There are several political statements woven into the storyline, including the lies promoted by the Bush administration that there were Weapons of Mass Destruction in Iraq. There was also a scene where a retired government agent says that the shooter on the grassy knoll was murdered and buried in the desert after he participated in the murder of John F. Kennedy.

While the majority of the population thinks that people who talk about actual conspiracies in the government get their ideas from watching films such as Shooter, the truth is that the writers of such films get their ideas from actual events. Subtle signs including the scene showing the 9/11 Commission Report are often missed by the uninformed viewers, but serve to show those who have eyes to see that the writer or director is making a statement with their film. Shooter was based on the 1993 novel Point of Impact by Stephen Hunter, and was directed by Antoine Fuqua.

Air America

Mel Gibson and Robert Downy Jr. star in Air America, a 1990 film about the U.S. government shipping heroin into the country by using CIA agents in Laos, Vietnam. The screenplay was adapted from a non-fiction book by Christopher Robbins with the same name.

Air America is actually the name of a cargo airline that was owned and operated by the CIA from 1950 to 1976 which supplied covert operations in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam War. This airline was believed to be used to also transport heroine into the United States. This would ultimately be the inspiration for Christopher Robbins' book and Air America the film.

Wag the Dog

Robert De Niro and Dustin Hoffman star in the 1997 film Wag the Dog which eerily mirrored the events of the Monica Lewinsky scandal which was occurring at the same time the film was released. In the film, Dustin Hoffman plays a movie producer who helps the government concoct a war with Albania in order to distract the American people from a sex scandal involving the President and an intern.

As part of the plot, Willie Nelson was hired to write a theme song for the war in order to encourage patriotism and keep the public support as the government's corrupt propaganda campaign continued. In real life, Nelson would later become vocal about the 9/11 attacks and the World Trade Center being blown up by a controlled demolition, and has been an anti-war advocate for a long time. His decision to appear in Wag the Dog was most likely a result of his understanding how the film, while being fictional, showed how propaganda campaigns are waged to generate and keep public support for wars, and that the real reason for the war is rarely given to the public.

Wag the Dog was written by Hilary Henkin and David Mamet. It is believed that Henkin had an uncredited role in writing the screenplay for V for Vendetta (2006).

Oliver Stone's JFK

Perhaps the most popular "conspiracy" type of film is Oliver Stone's JFK which was released in 1991 and starred Kevin Costner. The film was both attacked and praised, depending on how critics felt about the idea of who killed President Kennedy. The film is a dramatized version of events surrounding the assassination of John F. Kennedy in 1963 and depicts the idea that Oswald was not the only shooter and that Kennedy was killed as a larger plot by the CIA. Aside from being attacked by critics, Stone actually received death threats over the film's production.

In 1991 when it was released, a writer for the Chicago Tribune wrote that it was "an insult to the intelligence" and George Larnder, who worked as the national security correspondent for the Washington Post attacked "the absurdities and palpable untruths in Garrison's book and Stone's rendition of it."[198]

Bernard Weinraub wrote an article in The New York Times titled "Hollywood Wonders If Warner Brothers let JFK Go Too Far" and suggested that the studio should have killed the film before it went into production, saying, "At what point does a studio exercise its leverage and blunt the highly charged message of a film maker like Oliver Stone?"[199]

Conversely, the Miami Herald said, "the focus on the trivialities of personality conveniently prevents us from having to confront the tough questions his film raises." And film critic Roger Ebert wrote, "The achievement of the film is not that it answers the mystery of the Kennedy assassination, because it does not, or even that it vindicates Garrison, who is seen here as a man often whistling in the dark. Its achievement is that it tries to marshal the anger which ever since 1963 has been gnawing away on some dark shelf of the national psyche."[200]

The president of the Motion Picture Association of America, Jack Valenti, released a seven page statement about the film saying, "In much the same way, young German boys and girls in 1941 were mesmerized by Leni Reifenstahl's Triumph of the Will, in which Adolf Hitler was depicted as a newborn God. Both J. F. K. and Triumph of the Will are equally a propaganda masterpiece and equally a hoax. Mr. Stone and Leni Reifenstahl have another genetic linkage: neither of them carried a disclaimer on their film that its contents were mostly pure fiction."[201]

Despite being barraged with attacks, the film was ranked the fourth best of the year by Time Magazine and Robert Ebert called it the best film of the year and one of the top ten films of the decade.[202] It was nominated for eight Academy Awards including Best Picture, and Stone was nominated for Best Director by the Directors Guild of America, and won a Golden Globe for Best Director. During his acceptance speech he said, "A terrible lie was told to us 28 years ago. I hope that this film can be the first step in righting that wrong."[203]

In 2006 when word started to circulate that Oliver Stone was working on a film about the 9/11 attacks, many had hoped, (and others feared) that he was going to produce a similar “conspiracy” type of film showing a dramatized version of how elements within intelligence agencies pulled strings to aid and allow the 9/11 attacks to happen. It turned out that the film, which was titled World Trade Center, focused on the rescue of two New York City Port Authority workers.

Then several years later it was discovered that Stone was working on a film about George W. Bush, and hopes were revived that he would finally take up the task of exposing the 9/11 inside job to a worldwide audience. Sadly Stone failed to deliver and instead produced W. which was a biopic attack on George W. Bush and the war on terror, but did not include anything about Bush and his Illuminati cohorts aiding in the 9/11 attacks.

As a result of Stone’s avoidance of these issues, despite them growing from a small underground movement to boiling over into the mainstream, many suspect that Stone has sold out and some even consider him an accomplice in the 9/11 cover-up for not addressing the topic after producing two films about 9/11 and George W. Bush.

Bulworth

Warren Beatty starred in Bulworth, a film about a California Senator named Jay Billington Bulworth (Beatty) who decides to speak his mind and tell the public exactly how things work in politics as he runs for re-election. Bulworth is ultimately murdered by a medical insurance representative because of his push for socialized medicine which would put the insurance companies out of business. The film was release in 1998 and was co-written and co-produced by Beatty himself.

The final scene shows a homeless man as he says, “Bulworth, you’ve got to be a spirit. You can’t be no ghost,” meaning he was a spirit of truth and died a martyrs death.

Conspiracy Theory

Mel Gibson and Julia Roberts star in the 1997 film Conspiracy Theory about a taxi driver who everyone thinks is a lunatic and a conspiracy theorist because he thinks the government is involved in all kinds of conspiracies.

The film starts off with Jerry Fletcher (Gibson) driving a cab and talking to his passengers about how the government adds fluoride to the drinking water to dumb the population down and make everyone a slave to the state and that pets are getting implanted with computer identification chips and soon they'll be implanting them in humans.[204] He continues to say that George Bush (senior) is a 33rd degree Mason and the former director of the CIA and that "he knew what he was saying when he said 'New World Order' during his State of the Union speech in 1991."

Fletcher (Gibson) had become friends with Julia Robert's character (Alice) after he saved her from being mugged in the past, and she basically feels like she has to be nice to him and listen to his seemingly paranoid conspiracy theories every time she sees him. Alice is an attorney for the Justice Department and is haunted by her father's mysterious murder.

As it turns out, a man named Dr. Jonas (played by Patrick Stewart), worked for the CIA on MK-ULTRA mind control experiments and was involved in brainwashing Gibson's character into becoming a mind controlled assassin in the past. The film mentions MK-ULTRA by name and makes several references to Manchurian Candidate mind control. For example, Fletcher is shown to have an obsession with The Catcher in the Rye. When the book is discovered in his belongings, a police officer observes out loud that Mark David Chapman had that book on him when he shot John Lenin, and another officer remarks that the same book had been found in John Hinckley's possessions after he had shot Ronald Reagan in an assassination attempt. Both Chapman and Hinckley are suspected to be victims of mind control who were programmed to be assassins. There are also casual references to the Kennedy assassination and Oswald, as well as secret handshakes and the Military Industrial Complex.

It is obvious that the script was inspired by actual events such as the MK-ULTRA program, and the writer was very familiar with "conspiracy theory" culture. The only disappointing aspect of the film is that Fletcher (Gibson) was portrayed as a lunatic who happened to be right. Mixed with historical conspiracies and sinister government projects are paranoid delusions and gibberish which erodes from the credibility of Fletcher's claims. Conspiracy Theory was written by Brian Helgeland, who is credited with writing or producing a variety of films, including Assassins (1995), A Knight's Tale (2001), and The Order (2003).

The Manchurian Candidate

In 2004 a remake of the 1964 film, The Manchurian Candidate was released starring Denzel Washington which depicted a Gulf War veteran named Major Ben Marco (Washington) who comes to discover that he and his military unit were the victims of a top secret government program involving brainwashing.

Those who orchestrated his brainwashing operation planned to have him assassinate the president of the United States so that the vice president (played by Liev Schreiber) would take control of the White House and thus aid the profits and actions of the Manchurian Global Corporation, the very corporation that was behind the brainwashing experiments.

The film is based on actual experiments in the MK-ULTRA program, where drugs, hypnotism, and trauma-based mind control experiments were conducted in attempts to actually create a mind controlled assassin who would carry out orders without question, just like the one in the film.

Some believe that Sirhan Sirhan, the man who killed Robert Kennedy, was a victim of MK-ULTRA mind control programs. Others suspected of being programmed assassins by the CIA include John Hinckley Jr., who shot President Ronald Reagan in 1981 in an assassination attempt. The Hinckley family maintained a close relationship with the Bush family, and some suspect that John Hinckley's attempted murder of President Reagan was orchestrated using mind control techniques so that George H.W. Bush, who was then the vice president under Reagan, could become the president. For three generations, the Bush family have been members of Skull and Bones and knowingly and willingly serve the Illuminati. (See America's Secret Establishment page 85) (See The Search for the Manchurian Candidate page 115)

Enemy of the State

Will Smith stars in Enemy of the State which was released in 1998 and showed the technological capability of the National Security Agency, and what could happen if the systems were abused. While the capabilities of the technology shown in the film were considered the design of science fiction, systems such as Echelon and spy satellites are very much a reality. The American people came to know after 9/11 that such systems were being used to illegally listen to people's phone calls and have the ability to activate the microphone in a cell phone and use it as a listening device to pick up conversations in the surrounding areas, even when the phone is turned off.[205] Enemy of the State was written by David Marconi who was also one of the writers for the story of Live Free or Die Hard (2007) which was part four of the Die Hard series starring Bruce Willis.

Batman Returns

Michael Keaton, Christopher Walken, and Danny DeVito star in Batman Returns (1991) which includes multiple Illuminati symbols and references to actual false flag terror attacks. For example, at a costume party one of the bad guys, Max Shreck (Walken), is dressed as a genie with an all seeing eye inside of a pyramid placed on his forehead. At another point in the film he is shown displaying a model of a power plant he would like to build which is in the shape of a pyramid with the capstone missing. Another antagonist, the Penguin, has an umbrella which contains the pattern of the Knights Templars' red cross. While some may see these symbols as nothing more than random costume and set designs, one scene contains a blatant reference to actual historic false flag terror attacks.

At one point Shreck (Walken) and the Penguin (DeVito) are plotting to install Penguin as the mayor and use their power to take over the city of Gotham. As the two are discussing their plans, Shreck proposes "an incident like the Gulf of Tonkin or the Reichstag fire" and the two laugh with delight. Both events were, in reality, false flag events. (See Terrorstorm page 274) Batman Returns was written by San Hamm and Daniel Watters.

Dragnet

The 1987 comedy Dragnet starring Dan Aykroyd and Tom Hanks is about two police detectives who are given an assignment to investigate a religious cult in Los Angeles.

The two men eventually follow a popular televangelist to a ceremony put on by a group called P.A.G.A.N. (People Against Goodness And Normalcy). The ceremony the group is about to participate in is a human sacrifice. The parallels are subtle yet similar to the activities in the Bohemian Grove, and it is not far-fetched to think that the writer and producers either knew of, or had heard rumors of the activities within the club, which then served as the inspiration for the plot of Dragnet.

The word bohemian actually means, “one who lives and acts free of regard for conventional rules and practices,” and was likely the inspiration for the group P.A.G.A.N. (People Against Goodness And Normalcy), found in the film. The screenplay was written by a collaboration of Jack Webb, Dan Aykroyd, Alan Zweibel, and Tom Mankiewicz.

Television Show References

Aside from the Illuminati being worked into the plotline of various Hollywood movies, the subject matter is also occasionally referenced in television shows as well. Popular shows from The Simpsons and South Park, to lesser known TV series such as Wild Palms and The Lone Gunmen have all included plotlines stemming from actual events that the Illuminati have organized or participated in. To an uninformed audience, these aspects are merely seen as another fictional storyline, but the more informed viewer sees these issues as deliberate insertions by the shows' writers or producers to make a larger statement as their art imitates life.

South Park

A trashy, foul mouthed cartoon for adults, Southpark, has lampooned various people and institutions by simply presenting various bizarre facts in a humorous way. For example, an episode about Mormonism presented the actual beliefs about the Mormon Church and put a banner on the bottom of the screen saying, "This is actually what Mormons believe," and it was what they believe. An episode about Scientology used the same method when presenting information about the organization. It was funny for most of the audience, although insulting for members of such organizations.

A more disturbing episode also used the tactic. An episode about a group the show called the "Super Adventure Club" was about an international organization of pedophiles who travel around the world to have sex with young boys because they believe that it gives them magical power.

In the cartoon, the current leader of the group explains, "Our club offers hope. Do you think we go around the world molesting children because it feels really good? No. Our club has a message and a secret that explains the mysteries of life."

The man goes on to explain the history of the club and how a man named William P. Finius was a great traveler and explorer who also was a pedophile. After talking about all countries the man traveled to, he continued to say, “But now the most wonderful part. You see, after having sex with all those children, Finius realized that molesting all those kids had made him immortal. He discovered that children have things called marlocks in their bodies and when an adult has sex with a child, the marlocks implode feeding the adult’s receptor cavity with energy that causes immortality.”

While this is completely disgusting and not funny at all, what many of the viewers didn’t know is that one of the most hidden secrets in the occult is the belief that by having sex with a male child, an individual can experience altered states of consciousness and achieve a level of super enlightenment or immortality. Trey Parker and Matt Stone must have been aware of this esoteric occult practice and wrote it into their show. I’m not saying they have participated in such activities, but they must be familiar with the Illuminati and such material. (See Sex Magic page 305)

Again, just like the episodes making fun of Scientology and the Mormons, they inserted a banner on the bottom of the screen saying “This is what the Super Adventure Club actually believes.” How else could they have come up with such an idea, and why would they put the banner on the screen explaining it’s what these people actually believe, in the same way they did in other episodes about strange religious beliefs?

Rescue Me

The television series Rescue Me which airs on the FX network is a show about New York City firefighters starring Dennis Leary. In 2007, the show’s costar Daniel Sunjata created a stir on the Internet when he came on several patriot radio shows to discuss his stance that the 9/11 attacks were an inside job. Sunjata is extremely knowledgeable and articulate and while other actors who voiced similar beliefs seemed afraid to blatantly state that the 9/11 attacks were an inside job, Sunjata makes no bones about it. The mainstream media did not attack Sunjata for his comments, possibly because he is not a household name like Charlie Sheen or Rosie O'Donnell, who made headlines for speaking about such issues.

Several years after Sunjata's radio interviews about 9/11, writers for Rescue Me had incorporated some of his personal views into his character. In one scene, Franco (Sunjata) was being interviewed by a reporter when he states, "What you're going to hear from me, you're not going to hear from anybody else. Because, my opinions, let's just say they're not popular. 9/11? Inside job. Plain and simple. And all you gotta do is connect the dots. And I'm not talking about the dots everyone has heard about... I am talking about a massive neoconservative government effort that's been in the works twenty years. Ever heard of PNAC? Project for a New American Century? According to them, the end goal of their effort is American global domination. Full spectrum dominance, they call it. Now, first question that pops into my mind is: How do you pull that off in this day and age?"

The reporter, played by Catherine Zeta Jones, sits quietly and continues to listen. Franco (Sunjata) goes on, "Well, according to them you do it in four steps. First, we must control the world's oil. Now I don't have to remind you that Bush and Cheney came into power with plans all ready to attack Afghanistan and Iraq. Number two, we have to make huge technological advances with our armed forces. Number three…surprise, surprise, huge increases in military spending to pay for the above. Number four, and this is key. We change the definition of preemptive attack so we can unilaterally bomb the shit out of, invade, and occupy countries even if they pose no credible threat or had nothing to do with 9/11. One problem. How are you going to put that into action? I mean, the American people are never going to go for no shit like that, right? Damn straight. Now what you need is an event. An event that gets everyone's heads turned around the right way. What you need is a new Pearl Harbor. That's what they said they needed. You're looking at a guy who went to fifty-eight funerals in twenty six days, I can tell you that is sure as shit what they got."

Many of the viewers might not know the story behind how this idea was worked into the script. In an interview Sunjata explained, "I'm really gratified that they allowed that to be focused through my character, because I happen to subscribe to a lot of those theories and beliefs that 9/11 was an inside job."[206]

This surprised the interviewer, and when asked to clarify this, Peter Tolan, the show's co-creator explained, "That's part of the reason why we wrote it, is because Danny actually has—is actually well-read on—he's done a lot of research on this and has told us about it. And, you know, look, obviously not all of us buy in. But we went, wow, that's interesting, and he's passionate about it. Let's use that."[207]

Sunjata went on to say, "there are some very, very well-thought-out ideas and theories that seem to me to make a lot more sense than the ones that are popularly espoused. And anyway, the fact that they've allowed that conversation to be had within the world of Rescue Me, I think, is admirable and should be applauded."[208]

The Lone Gunmen

A television series that ran on Fox in 2001 called The Lone Gunmen aired an episode March 4, 2001 with a plot of a corrupt faction within the government hijacking a jet and trying to crash it into the World Trade Center to further the objectives of the Military Industrial Complex. Watching the episode is like watching a made for TV movie about the September 11th attacks only it was produced months prior to the event.

One of the stars of the show, Dean Haglund, later came forward and said the FBI and NASA would approach Chris Carter, the show's creator, with story ideas for various shows. Haglund also said that since the 1980s the CIA had hired informants who attend Hollywood parties and report back to the CIA on general trends and issues that writers and producers were focusing on. Haglund believed this was to tip-off the CIA if any famous writers or film makers were developing a project that would be potentially damaging to the government's image or incite people to react in an unfavorable fashion.

It is certainly possible that the plot for The Lone Gunmen involving the government attempting to crash a jet into the World Trade Center in order to use the incident to justify military expansion was an idea that was given to the show's writers by the FBI consultants who worked with the producers. The purpose for this would be to point to the show as the source of such "conspiracy theories" when people started to figure out that elements within the government aided in the 9/11 attacks.

Another explanation, of course, is that the writers were aware of how governments use false flag terrorism, and had read reports about terrorist groups planning to hijack planes and crash them into prominent buildings in America prior to September 11th 2001. While many American's still believe that the 9/11 attacks were a complete surprise and that intelligence agencies had never heard of such plans, the truth is that as far back as 1995 the CIA was aware of plans to hijack planes and crash them into the World Trade Center.[209] The Islamic terrorists who had planned this plot called it Project Bojinka.

24

The show 24 is a popular television action drama broadcast by Fox which has aired since November 2001. The show stars Keifer Sutherland, who plays Jack Bauer, an agent for the fictional Counter Terrorism Unit (CTU). The show is a high budget action packed hour which features Bauer (Sutherland) and his fellow CTU officers tracking down domestic terrorists and saving America from various terrorist attacks including nuclear and biological.

In the show, Bauer frequently violates the law and the Constitution in order to save the country from the terrorists. He doesn't follow legal statutes, and tortures suspects in an attempt to extract information from them. Instead of being seen as a corrupt agent who is a danger to the integrity of the United States, Jack Bauer is seen as a hero defending America. Numerous episodes depict the people who are against Bauer torturing people as the reason that the terrorists get away. Such plots are created to serve as government propaganda and teaches the audience that it's ok for government officials to break the law and torture people, because it is believed such actions are necessary to keep us safe from terrorists. Sutherland's character is presented as a hero who is only hindered by the law, and must continuously take matters into his own hands in order to do what is right for the country.

All experts who are not on the Illuminati's payroll agree that using torture as a method to extract information from suspects is not a reliable method because if the suspect doesn't know the information his captors desire, he will simply start agreeing with whatever they ask, with hopes that it will satisfy them so they will end the torture. Such practices are a violation of international law, but that didn't stop the Bush administration from approving waterboarding suspects in the War on Terror. Waterboarding basically consists of strapping a suspect down on a table and pouring water down their throat until they nearly drown. Such a practice had previously been classified as torture by the Department of Defense, but officials simply use the term "enhanced interrogation techniques" and used the practice in secret until such methods were exposed to the public. Other suspects are transferred to foreign countries which then torture them on behalf of the U.S. so America can claim their hands are clean. Such a practice is labeled "rendition" and is used to torture suspects by proxy.

Shows like 24 serve only as Illuminati propaganda to desensitize people to the inhumane practices of the government and lead everyone to believe that all suspects are guilty and can be treated worse than animals. Anytime any illegal or inhumane strategies are faced with opposition, the government accuses those who oppose it as being un-American, or aiding the terrorists.

Gargoyles

A cartoon airing on the Disney Channel from 1994 to 1997 called Gargoyles included several episodes which mentioned the Illuminati and one of the main characters was shown to be a member.

The cartoon featured several creatures, called Gargoyles, which turned to stone during the daytime and were animated during the night. The series was produced by Greg Weisman and Frank Paur. Weisman also was a writer for the Men in Black animated series which aired on the Kid's WB for several seasons.

Wild Palms

A 1993 mini-series airing on ABC titled Wild Palms is about a power-mad corporation which hopes to brainwash society by using its advanced virtual reality technology. Oliver Stone and Bruce Wagner were the executive producers of the series. It starred James Belushi, Dana Delany, Angie Dickinson, and Kim Cattrall.

While the series is extremely dull and drawn out with bad acting, it contains some interesting aspects which were undoubtedly inspired from actual events. Basically, the series is about a California senator named Tony Kreutzer (played by Robert Loggia) who is also the head of the Channel 3 television station and the founder of a popular religion called Synthiotics. This new "religion" was obviously a reference to Scientology. As the series continues, the viewer discovers that there are two political groups that oppose each other, the Friends, and the Fathers. The Friends are libertarians and support the Bill of Rights, where the Fathers are ruthless and fascistic.

The Fathers are planning for the senator to run for president and then become all powerful using the hologram technology. Members of this group have small tattoos on their hand which awards them special privileges in society. At one point, the libertarian Friends try to warn James Belushi's character about the fascistic Fathers and explain that they had planned the Great Depression and major terrorist attacks and wars.

There is a brief scene where a television is on in the background which shows Oliver Stone being interviewed on a talk show and the interviewer says to Stone, "15 years after the release of your film JFK the documents are released, and you were right. The conspiracy turned out to be so much larger than you presented in the film. Can you comment on that?"

Recall that Wild Palms aired in 1993 and takes place in the future. The producers were trying to show that the JFK assassination had been proven to be a conspiracy, and was now public knowledge.

At the end of the series as the senator's plans are foiled, he freaks out and yells, "I am a soldier. I am mustering my troops! And we are storming Heaven!"

The Simpsons

In a 1995 episode of the popular animated cartoon, The Simpsons, Homer joins an all-male fraternity in Springfield called the Stonecutters, an obvious reference to the Freemasons. The Freemason fraternity evolved out of ancient stone masons and trade guilds who kept knowledge secret about how to work with stone and build cathedrals and castles. The episode is titled "Homer the Great" and starts of with Homer noticing that two of his friends, Lenny and Carl, are enjoying special privileges around town and at work such as comfortable chairs and premium parking spots. After Homer becomes suspicious, he finds out that they are members of the Stonecutters secret society, and is allowed to become a member himself.

The episode contains numerous humorous incidents, and references to Freemasonry. Homer ultimately ends up accidentally destroying the society's sacred parchment, which is an ancient document containing secrets of the group that had been handed down for generations. The Stonecutters were also waiting for "the Chosen One" who would one day lead the organization to glory. The episode was written by John Swartzwelder.

In one entertaining scene, all of the members sing a quick song while inside their lodge and drinking beer. The song is titled We Do and was nominated for an Emmy Award for "Outstanding Music And Lyrics." The lyrics are about how the Stonecutters secretly rule the world, held back the production of the electric car to benefit the oil companies, and keep information about aliens from becoming public.

Another funny storyline that the show's creators worked into a plot for a different episode was also clearly inspired from actual events. In the show immediately preceding the 2008 presidential election, the cartoon included a scene showing Homer entering a voting booth which contained an electronic voting machine. When Homer used the touchscreen to press the "Obama" button, the electronic voice announced, "One vote for McCain." Homer seemed puzzled and pressed the "Obama" button again, only to have the machine say "Two votes for McCain." "Wait a minute! This machine is rigged!" Homer yells. Then a trap door in the machine opens and starts sucking him down a tube. As he's being pulled in he says, "This doesn't happen in America. Maybe in Ohio, but not America!"

It is interesting that the writers included this short little segment into the show, but it is even more interesting that they included the comment about Ohio. In case you don't see the significance of this statement, the Illuminati used electronic voting machines in Ohio (as well as other states) to steal the election for George W. Bush in 2004. This is why all the exit polls in Ohio showed John Kerry would win the state on election night, but it ultimately went to Bush. (See Hacking Democracy page 295)

The YouTube clip titled Homer Simpson tries to vote for Obama, which depicts this scene had received 6.4 million views at the time of this writing, and may or may not still be available online.

One other brief reference to Freemasons in the cartoon which was likely missed by most of the audience is a scene when Mr. Burns has become a germaphobe and as he is looking at his assistant's face he hallucinates that it is covered with bacteria and in a high pitched tone they say "Freemasons run the country."

The Cartoon Network

Lucy, Daughter of the Devil is an adult cartoon shown on Turner Broadcasting's Cartoon Network late at night as part of the network's "Adult Swim." It is a ten minute CGI comedy with a plot involving Satan who lives in San Francisco and is trying to convince his 21-year-old daughter, Lucy, to fulfill her role as the Antichrist. Lucy's boyfriend is DJ Jesús, a techno DJ who is actually Jesus Christ.

On October 7th, 2007 an episode aired titled Human Sacrifice in which the Devil is invited to attend a human sacrifice ritual at the Bohemian Grove which will honor a senator who has been chosen to be elected as the next president.

DJ Jesús is chosen as the human sacrifice and is lured to the Bohemian Grove under the pretense that he will be DJing a party. He is actually told the party will be like the film Eyes Wide Shut and that Alan Greenspan (former chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank) will be there.

The Bohemian Grove in the cartoon is clearly modeled after the actual Grove or from the footage of Alex Jones' film Dark Secrets Inside Bohemian Grove. The ritual begins with people lighting torches, which is also identical to the real Bohemian Grove, and then shows the audience which is said to contain half of Washington, chanting "hail Satan." Before the sacrifice, Satan tells the audience that ten presidents have announced their candidacy in the Bohemian Grove.

In the end, DJ Jesús escapes without being killed, and the show concludes by zooming out to an aerial view showing the location of the incident being in Northern California, where the actual club is located.

Corporate Logos

Since the teachings and secret knowledge that is given to Illuminati members as they climb the ranks within the hierarchy gives them a tremendous advantage in business and politics, it is no surprise that most major multinational corporations were started by Illuminati families and members. By using their advanced knowledge, backroom deals, and unconscionable practices, they have created and maintained the corner of the market in multiple industries such as oil, banking, entertainment, and news media. What is even more interesting is that an extremely large number of these companies have incorporated Illuminati symbolism into their logos. All seeing eyes, pyramids, the sun, and mythical figures are found in numerous logos from CBS to America Online.

CBS's logo is actually an all seeing eye. Mobile Oil prints their logo in blue with exception of the letter o in Mobile, which is printed in red to signify the sun. The symbol for Infinity automobiles is a pyramid with a sun behind it. Fidelity Investments' logo is a pyramid with an all seeing eye on the top. The o in Morning Star investments represents the sun and is a different shape than the rest of the letters. Lucifer is often called the Morning Star. The list goes on and on.

Many logos for Hollywood production studios also include Illuminati symbolism. Paramount Pictures' logo is a huge mountain shaped like a pyramid surrounded by a ring of stars; Tri-Star's logo is a winged Pegasus; Columbia Pictures' logo features the goddess Semiramis holding a torch; Prometheus Entertainment, Orion, Icon, Lions Gate Films, DreamWorks, and many other companies have Masonic/occult symbolism in their logos.

Music References

A small number of musicians have occasionally referenced the Illuminati in their songs, although most of these artists are underground and are rarely, if ever, played on the corporate owned airwaves on stations like Clear Channel or similar monopolized markets. Some of these artists, such as Paris and Prodigy, mention the Illuminati by name, while others from rappers to rockers seem to be very well aware of the evil deeds of the brotherhood, a fact that becomes clear by simply listening to the lyrics of their songs or watching the music videos that accompany them. Below is just a sample of musicians, some of which are extremely well known, who have made such references in their songs.

It's important to note that the Illuminati financially supports musicians whose music preaches socially destructive messages, and builds them up as role models which the brain-dead masses worship as idols. The fact that many musicians achieve massive success isn't necessarily that they are extremely talented, it's that they have been chosen to be promoted because their music encourages violent, immoral, and social destructive behavior. Their music is literally used to brainwash the listeners. Occasionally an artist who is an unknowing Illuminati pawn will actually write a song which counters their very purpose for being promoted, as in the case of Eminem.

Eminem

Marshall Mathers, aka Slim Shady, aka Eminem released a music video just before the 2004 presidential election for his song titled Mosh which is a scathing attack against George W. Bush and his fear mongering surrounding the War on Terror.

The video starts with a parody of George W. Bush reading My Pet Goat to a classroom of school children as a jet flies over the school and crashes into the World Trade Center. It then cuts to Eminem standing in front of a wall covered with newspaper clippings and headlines about Bush's foreknowledge of the 9/11 attacks, including the New York Post's front page headline "Bush Knew."

Eminem roars "look in his eyes it's all lies" as the music video cuts from President Bush to a cardboard cutout of Osama Bin Laden on a soundstage controlled by Donald Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney. Eminem rallies dozens of people and they surround the Capitol building and head up the stairs and start pouring inside in what appears to be the beginning of a riot, when it is revealed that they are all lining up to vote. The song itself is extremely powerful, but the music video, which was produced by the Guerilla New Network is historic and presents a powerfully positive message about activism and power in numbers.

Despite this powerful song, Eminem is actually an unknowing pawn of the Illuminati and was promoted by them as a role model for the youth because the vast majority of his music preaches violence, immorality, and irresponsibility. His song Mosh is mentioned in this book because despite his dark and troubled soul, it appears that even Eminem could see through the lies of the Bush administration.

Dr. Dre

Rapper Dr. Dre included a line about buying his own island before the year 2000 and that he "ain't trying to stick around for Illuminati" in his song Been There, Done That.

Neil Young

In 2006 Neil Young released an entire album of war protest songs titled Living with War. One of those songs, Let's Impeach the President, was nominated for a Grammy Award and contained lyrics referring to the shadow government, spying on American citizens, and George W. Bush hijacking Christianity to get elected.

Don Henley

In 2000, Don Henley, the singer from The Eagles, released a solo album titled Inside Job which contained a song with the same title which speaks universal truths regarding government corruption and inside jobs in general. While the song was recorded and released before the September 11th attacks, it has become a theme song for what really happened that fateful day and a warning for what lies ahead.

“It was an inside job by the well-connected” Henley sings. Other lyrics include that they know what you’ve had for breakfast and what you’ve hid beneath the mattress. “Chalk it up to business as usual,” Henley concludes.

Megadeth

The heavy metal band Megadeth has a song titled New World Order with lyrics that talk about how all currency has become obsolete and that “Revelation has come to pass” and “all rights will be denied…without the mark you shall die,” referring to the mark of the Beast.

Ministry

In 2006 the industrial metal band, Ministry, released an album titled Rio Grande Blood which contained several songs about the War on Terrorism and 9/11. The song Lies Lies Lies, actually sampled sound bites from the film Loose Change saying, “Do you still think that jet fuel brought down the World Trade Center?”

Jadakiss

In 2004, rapper Jadakiss released his second album titled Kiss of Death which included a track titled Why? which contained one line that set off a media firestorm and would cause his song to either be pulled from the radio, or the one line censored when it was played.

The line which resulted in so much controversy was, “Why did Bush knock down the towers?” referring to the World Trade Center. Fox News’ Bill O’Reilly publicly stated that President Bush should sue Jadakiss for slander.

Flowbots

Flobots are an American alternative hip hop band from Denver, Colorado who got mainstream exposure in 2008 with their song Handlebars which was released in 2007 on their album Fight with Tools. The song and the accompanying video ring of overtones attacking the War on Terror and the rise of dictatorial powers. The video also depicts mob mentality and shows how easily the population can be “led by a microphone.”

Conspirituality

The Vancouver rap duo Conspirituality released a song titled AmBUSHED in 2009 on their debut album which contains lyrics about 9/11, Bohemian Grove, the Illuminati, and the Bush administration’s torture of prisoners and other war crimes. The video was produced by DJ Ball and depicts men in orange prison jumpsuits chasing down President Bush, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and others as they run for their lives to avoid paying the penalty for their crimes.

Paris

A rapper named Paris on the Guerilla Funk record label has produced numerous songs about the New World Order and the Illuminati. One of his most popular tracks is What Would You Do? In the song, Paris exposes the Illuminati's agenda in a venomous poem which is delivered with the precision and quality of any chart-topping single. Paris raps, "The Illuminati triple six all connected. Stolen votes they control the race and take elections."

Immortal Technique

Another popular underground artist is Immortal Technique, a rapper whose every word is a blistering attack on 9/11 in songs like Bin Laden and Cause of Death which inundate the listener with hard facts and evidence delivered with the power and poise of Martin Luther King.

Sean "P. Diddy" Colmes

In 1997, Sean "P. Diddy" Colmes released a music video for a song titled Victory featuring the Notorious B.I.G. and Busta Rhymes. The video takes place in the "New World Order" in the year 3002 AD which is a Big Brother police state and depicts Sean Colmes as being pursued by the police as part of a televised game show which was most likely inspired by the film The Running Man (1987).

Prodigy

Albert Johnson, known by his stage name Prodigy is a rapper and member of the duo Mobb Deep. Prodigy's third solo album titled H.N.I.C.2 was released in April of 2008 and included a song titled "Illuminati." The song is entirely about the Illuminati secret society and includes a chorus saying, "Illuminati want my mind, soul and my body. Secret society trying to keep their eye on me."

During the 2008 presidential campaign when practically every African American entertainer or celebrity was thrilled that Barack Obama was running for president, Prodigy called him a phony and a plastic president. He said, "I wish nothing but love and happiness for him, but he's either gonna be assassinated to create chaos and bring about martial law or he'll live and then years down the line, at the end of his term everybody will see that he's just like the rest of these plastic presidents, who does absolutely nothing good. Just another puppet for the Royal family."[210]

Prodigy also publicly voiced support for Congressman Ron Paul (R-Texas) who ran for president in 2008.

Jay-Z

Rapper Jay-Z (real name Sean Carter) has included some occult and Illuminati references in his music, but not as a way to expose the activities of the organization, but rather as a tribute to them. It seems that Jay-Z is familiar with the Illuminati and chose to aid them instead of fight them. Jay-Z is the founder of Roc-A-Fella Records, a name that refers to the Rockefeller Illuminati family.

A song titled Lucifer which was released on The Grey Album in 2004 which was produced by Danger Mouse, contains some disturbing messages. When listening to the song it is clear that a small part is playing backwards and is uninteligable. When the song is played in reverse, you can clearly hear Jay-Z saying, "Six six six, murder, murder Jesus" and "Catholics, I gotta murder them, I can introduce you to demons, leave niggas on death's door, and I can introduce you to evil."

It's important to stress that this is not a "subliminal message" meant to be picked up subconsciously by the listeners. It is more of a marketing ploy and a way to get Jay-Z fans talking about this unique aspect of one of his songs. It's also important to understand that the message is clearly understandable and is not the result of someone interpreting a series of sounds as saying such things.

When people hear the allegations of the reverse messages in the song Lucifer, most Jay-Z fans refer to the original song Lucifer which is found on Jay-Z's Black Album. Danger Mouse remixed the song for The Grey Album and edited Jay-Z's voice to say the disturbing things found in the song. Jay-Z never denounced Danger Mouse for doing such a thing and appears to be acceptant of it.

A popular photo of Jay-Z shows him making a pyramid with his index fingers and thumbs with his left eye in the middle, which is a popular Illuminati symbol. A letter that Prodigy wrote to his record label while in jail reveals that he believes Jay-Z is knowingly cooperating with the Illuminati and cites that as the reason he became so wealthy.

In a video posted to YouTube that was shot inside the studio when Jay-Z was recording the original song Lucifer for his Black Album you can hear him make a comment where he brags, “I swear I never read the Bible in my life, I don’t even know…(unintelligible).” In his song D’Evils he raps a verse where he says he never prays to God, he prays to Gotti (John Gotti the gangster).

Nas

Rapper Nas (real name Nasir Jones) is another rapper some believe is aware of the Illuminati, and is secretly a supporter and servant for them. In the song Be a Nigger Too, Nas raps, “My click’s still real QB gangsters. Click still moving like Freemasons so if I’m on the flow from the law there’s lodges all across the nation. Nas is bred for the plan. To hold a grand dragon’s head in my hand. Come and get me, here I am.”

There is also a picture on the Internet of Nas and Jay-Z using what looks to be a Masonic handshake. Nas has frequently referred to himself as “God’s son” which was also the title of one of his albums.

Tupac Shakur

Rapper Tupac Shakur, who was shot and killed in Las Vegas in 1996, released an album shortly before his death titled The Don Killuminati: The 7 Day Theory which remains the topic of speculation among his fans who think the title was a reference to killing the Illuminati. “The Don” is a mafia term for a mafia boss or leader, which leads some of Tupac’s fans to think that he had learned about the Illuminati and the album title was a coded name meaning he was the leader of the killers of the Illuminati.

Black Eyed Peas

The Los Angeles hip hop group Black Eyed Peas told people to “be prepared for the New World Order” in their song Say Goodbye which talks about what a mess the world is in and how society is falling apart.

Fat Boy Slim

The British DJ, Fat Boy Slim (Norman Quentin Cook) produced a song for the film Lara Croft: Tomb Raider which was titled Illuminati. In the film, Lara Croft is opposed by the Illuminati as they search for a mystical artifact. Fat Boy Slim’s song is basically an instrumental song but it starts by saying, “Illuminati. A secret society do exists.” Note: The lyrics actually read, “a secret society do exist” and is not a typo.

Skinny Puppy

The Canadian electronica band Skinny Puppy produced a song titled NeuWerld which says, “I trust we must distrust the owners of the New World Order.”

Poker Face

The American rock band Poker Face is known as a protest rock band and includes many themes about the New World Order and out of control governments in their music. The insert for their CD Made In America includes a montage of Illuminati symbols including the Skull and Bones logo, Masonic symbols, and the street layout of Washington D.C. Tracks such as Kontrol and Revolution are powerful songs promoting gun rights, the Constitution and exposing mainstream media propaganda.

Killarmy

In 1997 an affiliate of the rap group Wu-Tang Clan called Killarmy released their debut album titled Silent Weapons for Quiet Wars which was a reference to a document that author William Cooper published in his 1991 book, Behold a Pale Horse. (See William Cooper page 215) Wu-Tang Clan member Killah Priest is aware of the Illuminati and had contacted Antony J. Hilder in 2006 and invited him to the studio to record some sound bites for an album he was working on.

Meat Beat Manifesto

A UK electronic music group called Meat Beat Manifesto (MBF) produced a song called No Purpose No Design which includes several references to the Bavarian Illuminati.

The Jurassic 5

An American alternative hip hop group, The Jurassic 5, produced a song titled Concrete Schoolyard which contained one line saying the artist was anti-Illuminati.

Gamma Ray

A German metal band released an album in 2001 titled No World Order and has several references to the New World Order and the Illuminati. The songs were written by Kai Hansen.

The KLF

The KLF (also known as The Justified Ancients of Mu Mu—or the JAMMs were a British band from the 1980s which frequently used themes from Robert Anton Wilson's Illuminatus! Trilogy novels. (See The Illuminatus! Trilogy page 309)

Agent Steel

A speed metal band named Agent Steel released an album in 2003 called Order of the Illuminati. The band is well known for basing its lyrical concepts on conspiracy theories.

Killer Squirrel

An underground punk band named Killer Squirrel recorded a song in 2005 called The Cowboy Illuminati Get Their Revenge which mentions the Skull and Bones society at Yale University. The group's previous album Self Released (And Loving It) had a cover which featured artwork showing an eye on top of a pyramid.

Hed PE

A rock band from Huntington Beach, California named Hed PE (also known as (hed) planet earth) released an album in 2006 titled Back 2 Base X which contains several Illuminati and New World Order references in the lyrics and on the album artwork.

Bobby Conn

Bobby Conn is a pop-rock musician from Chicago who references the Illuminati and global domination in sarcastic and satirical ways. He once said he invented "The Continuous Cash Flow System" in order to bankrupt America by dramatically increasing the national debt. He also once claimed to be the Antichrist.

Malice Mizer

The Japanese rock band Malice Mizer produced a song titled Illuminati, which includes references to Biblical and sexual themes. The band officially went on an indefinite hiatus starting in December 2001.

Infected Mushrooms

In 2003 an Israeli psychedelic trance band called Infected Mushrooms released an album titled Converting Vegetarians which contains a song called Illuminaughty which contained lyrics talking about eating forbidden fruit and having one's eyes opened.

The Matthew Good Band

Singer Matthew Good has a song titled Lullaby for the New World Order which is a vague song with lyrics about how God gave us a voice and we should use it, and asks how can we get ourselves out of this trouble.

The Alan Parsons Project

The British progressive rock band The Alan Parsons Project has a song titled Eye in the Sky which has strange lyrics saying that the eye in the sky can read your mind and "I am the maker of rules…dealing with fools…I can cheat you blind." The album cover contains the Egyptian eye of Horus.

Solutions

When one comes to grips with the reality of a secret occult society which, for hundreds, perhaps thousands of years has pulled the strings from behind the scenes and has been operating an underground network to advance their own personal and political agendas and accumulate unimaginable wealth as a parasitic vampire feeding off the uninformed and uninitiated, one can be overcome with fear and anxiety. A dramatically large amount of information concerning such things is fully verifiable and accurate. And if even only ten percent of the more outrageous and disturbing claims are true, then certainly a monstrous and immeasurable evil is functioning in our world.

With such revelations, one must not retreat from society or become paralyzed from fears or paranoia. These things were happening long before you became aware of them, and they may continue to happen until the end of time. Nothing has changed in your life except your awareness of the hidden reality beneath the facade of lies that most people accept as the truth. But now that you see beyond this false reality that is presented to the world, there are several things you can do to either minimize, or in many cases, completely avoid the effects of such things on your life and on your family.

You have already used the first key to unlock your prison cell, and that is awareness. One cannot make the proper decisions if the information one has is inaccurate. Now you have accurate information, and the means by which you can obtain it to see through propaganda, lies, half-truths, and distortions. Now you see the bigger picture of why things are happening the way they are. By simply knowing how the system works, you can effectively maneuver through the world and avoid many of the traps and snares that have been set for you.

It is strongly advised that you take several precautions as insurance to protect yourself and your family from the dangers we face. You should purchase several firearms, including a hand gun, shot gun, and riffle, and learn how to responsibly handle and store them. Other simple self-defense devices such as clubs and knives should also be possessed. Hand to hand combat and self-defense training is also advised. You should keep your home fully stocked with food and water in case of an emergency such as a natural disaster, terrorist attack, or civil unrest.

You should invest in physical gold and silver coins and hold them in your possession or in a safety deposit box. You should also keep several thousand dollars in cash on hand as well. If there is an economic collapse (or computer failure) and credit and debit cards are no longer functioning or accepted, you will need to have cash to buy food, gas, and other necessities. Such a disaster will cause a run on the bank and ATM machines, and cash may be impossible to get for a considerable amount of time. Therefore a stash should be well hidden in your home or safety deposit box so you will not be like the countless herds who rush to the bank, and are likely turned away and return home penniless. Do not stash all your money in one hundred dollar bills, but instead keep a variety of denominations since it may be difficult to spend $100s and get back change during this time of crisis.

One of the most important things is to cultivate a healthy social circle of friends, family, and neighbors. The New World Order has isolated people from each other, and many live in their own world not even knowing the names of the very neighbors who they live next to. A close knit, safe and trustworthy community will prove to be a priceless asset as the New World Order solidifies.

You should also reach out and educate others. For those who want to know the truth and are seeking answers, the insights you share with them will help put them at ease by showing them the big picture. Giving them a copy of The Illuminati: Facts & Fiction or The Resistance Manifesto is also a great way to educate people since these books will present the most important information regarding the Illuminati and the New World Order. It is also pivotal that we befriend and educate the police and military. The more law enforcement officers and military personnel we have on our side, the safer we will be. When things get out of control and orders are given to blatantly violate the Constitution, many informed troops will simply refuse to participate and hopefully stand up to their superiors with their fellow troops who are informed as well. We also need assets of our own to covertly work within the system, who report back to us about the orders being given and secretly sabotage the New World Order's plans.

Financial responsibility is also another key ingredient to avoid entrapment by the New World Order. By not mindlessly participating in the materialistic shallow culture that is being perpetuated, you can minimize or even avoid the financial hardships that such behaviors ultimately lead to. Expensive status symbols that have no practical value suck money out of peoples' pockets as they joyfully indulge themselves with their material idols. Manufactured social pressures and the status quo uphold an illusion that one has substandard value if they do not participate in the rat race. By freeing yourself from the worry of judgment from others, you free yourself from the unnecessary burdens that such fears bring. Many fear the judgment from friends, and often from total strangers if they don't have the right brand of clothes, watch, or car. And it is this very fear that keeps them enslaved.

Running for public office yourself can lead to real and measurable changes in your community. While you will not, nor would you want to become the president of the United States, you can certainly run for any number of local and even state offices. The Illuminati does not have complete control of the political system on a small local level, and by becoming involved instead of throwing your hands up in submission, you can realistically bring tremendous benefits to your town, or even your state.

Finally you must live in a state of love and not fear. Learning about the Illuminati can be extremely terrifying, but you must not let the fear overshadow your love. By living by the golden rule of life and treating others the way you want to be treated, you will set in motion a chain of events that will spread in ways you cannot even begin to fathom. One small selfless act will encourage another, and another, in a never-ending chain of events.

If you treat someone with undeserving hostility, they will return that hostility directly back at you or to others, which in turn will have the same chain reaction and may echo around the world in ways you do not understand. If you are faced with such a negative energy, you may neutralize it with love instead of amplifying it with more negativity. You must be an example for others since you are enlightened with the truth. You must resist at all costs any temptation to sink to the immoral level of the Illuminati which we fight. This is not only a political battle which we are fighting, but a spiritual one as well. As you close this book after having absorbed the insights found within, I wish you the best on this journey of life. You are now armed with some of the forbidden knowledge that the Illuminati has done their best to keep hidden from you. As Jesus said, you now know the truth, and the truth shall set you free.

Illuminati Controlled Organizations

The Bilderberg Group

A yearly secret meeting of the world's leading politicians, media moguls, business titans, bankers, and royalty, who discuss and dispense their agenda for the coming months and years.

Council on Foreign Relations

A private organization that masquerades as a government committee which has tremendous influence over foreign policy and is used to construct the New World Order.

The Trilateral Commission

A private organization set up by David Rockefeller for the purpose of organizing America, Europe, and Japan into the New World Order.

The Bohemian Grove

A secluded 2700 acre redwood forest in Northern California where members meet every July to have private discussions of the next years events, and participate in a human sacrifice ritual to Moloch using a life-size paper mache effigy.

The Federal Reserve

A private bank that most Americans think is a government agency simply because of its name. The bank controls the money supply, interest rates, and loans money to the federal government for interest.

Freemasonry

A fairly well known global secret society in the form of a men's fraternity which is harmless on the lower levels, but within the cloak of secrecy at the top, members are intimately involved with nefarious occult activities and worship Lucifer.

Skull and Bones

An elite fraternity at Yale University in Connecticut which chooses fifteen new members each year and inducts them into the Illuminati with satanic rituals and pretend human sacrifices.

The Military

The Joint Chiefs of Staff, who are the head officials of each military branch, are carefully promoted and chosen for their willingness to serve the Illuminati. Secret cells committed to black ops are also under their control.

The Vatican

Once seen as the enemy of the Illuminati, the leadership within the Catholic Church and the secretive Jesuits have been working hand in hand with them for many years. The pope could one day be the false prophet talked about in the Bible who will tell the world that the antichrist is the return of Jesus.

Knights of Malta

An organization within the Catholic Church that is believed to contain an inner circle of individuals who work in tandem with the Jesuits (the Society of Jesus) to secretly maintain and expand the wealth and influence of the Catholic Church.

Radical Islam

Radical Muslims who kill innocent civilians and carry out deadly terrorist attacks around the world are funded and encouraged by the Illuminati to create an enemy and instill fear in populations so that freedoms and civil rights may be removed as part of the so-called solution to the problem.

Communism

While seen as the enemy of America and Capitalism, Communism is actually a creation of the Illuminati and is used as a controlled opposition to continue the construction of the New World Order.

World Council of Churches

A Christian unity organization containing over 300 churches in more than 120 countries. The combined membership of church bodies in the organization exceeds 550 million Christians. Its purpose is to merge Christianity into a one world religion.

Election Fraud

Besides using their control of the media and their unlimited supply of money to finance candidates who will serve their secret agendas, the Illuminati also have a strangle hold on elections through electronic voting machines and other fraudulent tactics to ensure the outcomes they desire.

The British Monarch

The British royal family secretly believes they are descendants of the lost tribe of Dan, and that they have the Divine right to rule as kings.

Royal Order of the Garter

An order of Knighthood in Europe involving the Prince of Wales and twenty-four other members of the British royal family or foreign monarchs.

MI-5 and MI-6

Just like all law enforcement branches and intelligence agencies in America have Illuminati handlers at the highest levels, the same is true for British MI-5, which is equivalent to the FBI, and MI-6 which is equivalent to the CIA.

Council of Chatham House

Formerly called the Royal Institute of International Affairs, the Council of Chatham House is the British version of America's Council on Foreign Relations. They gather prominent politicians, policy makers, members of business, academia, diplomats, the media, and researchers to formulate and dispense propaganda and agendas to the British government.

The Group

A secret society at Oxford University in England and is Europe's version of the Skull and Bones society found in America at Yale University.

The Triads

The Asian branch of the Illuminati mainly in China which is involved in organized crime of every kind from drug trafficking and money laundering to contract killings. Its membership ranges from low level street thugs to billionaire businessmen.

The CIA

The Central Intelligence Agency is responsible for overthrowing or implementing governments or dictators around the world so that the global goals and interests of the Illuminati may be carried out. It is not only an intelligence agency, but a covert terrorist organization and drug running agency.

The NSA

The National Security Agency built and maintains Echelon, the most sophisticated spy system ever created. Every form of electronic communication is monitored or recorded. Keywords, voiceprints, and specific phone numbers are tagged and intercepted among the billions of communications around the globe.

The FBI

FBI infrastructure and manpower is used to obtain wiretaps on politicians, activists, and whistle blowers, which are then used for blackmail purposes so these individuals can be controlled, contained, or eliminated.

The DEA

While most people who work in the Drug Enforcement Agency are trying to reduce illegal drugs on the streets, there is an inner circle who work hand in hand with drug cartels to import drugs and launder money.

Pharmaceuticals

Prescription drugs are designed and advertised as magic pills for every ailment from depression to anxiety, and mask the symptoms while ignoring the root cause behind these ailments to help keep the population legally sedated, and out of the way.

Entertainment

Money is funneled to promote musicians, TV shows, and films which teach and encourage immorality and violence, and help to keep the masses mesmerized and out of the way of political and social agendas that are being implemented.

The Mormon Church

This pseudo Christian cult was founded by Joseph Smith in 1830 based on his fraudulent Book of Mormon, and has steadily grown in wealth and size ever since. They teach and believe that Mormons are the only “true” Christians.

Jehovah’s Witnesses

Founded in the late 19th century by Charles Taze Russell, this Christian cult teaches a dramatically different doctrine than traditional Christianity, and serves as a poison to Christian theology.

Rhodes Trust

Named after Cecil Rhodes, as it was written in his will, the Rhodes Scholarship is an award given by the Rhodes Trust for a student to study at the University of Oxford in England. Students who are seen as potential assets for the Illuminati and their plans are given this scholarship.

The Cosmos Club

A social club founded in 1878 in Washington D.C. whose goal is “the advancement of its members in science, literature, and art.” Its members have included many recipients of the Nobel Prize, Pulitzer Prize, and Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Club of Rome

A global think tank founded in 1972 with the purpose of creating scientific reports which support the idea of population reduction in the world. Their report Limits to Growth, which was first published in 1972, began spreading information about the Illuminati’s plan to reduce the world’s population.

DARPA

The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) is an agency of the Department of Defense which develops new technology for the United States military. Some completed projects include the directed energy weapons such as the Active Denial System (ADS), the High Energy Liquid Laser Area Defense System (HELLADS), and the Predator drones.

Supreme Council of Wise Men

The top 10 most powerful men in the Illuminati form this inner circle of so-called wise men who are the puppet masters whose directives and orders flow down the pyramid to be spread and carried out by the proper organizations or delegated to others to follow.

The Council of 13

The executive branch of the Illuminati consisting of the heads of the top 13 Illuminati bloodlines known as kings. These kings, along with their queens, princes and princesses direct those below them in the Committee of 300 or directly run organizations themselves.

The Committee of 300

Directly under the Council of 13, the Committee of 300 are representatives of the top bloodlines and in key positions of power who have entire organizations that they are personally the heads of.

The Jasons

A scientific organization whose members are used as researchers and consultants for the Department of Defense. Jason members are made up of the brightest scientific minds in the country in an array of fields including theoretical physics, engineering, chemistry, and biology.

MJ-12

Also known as Majestic 12 or the Majestic Trust, this is believed by some to be a secret organization of scientists involved with research surrounding UFOs and aliens.

The Mothers of Darkness Castle

The Château des Amerois, also known as the Mothers of Darkness Castle, is an enormous castle located in Belgium near the village of Muno. Some believe that satanic ritual parties and child sacrifices take place in the castle annually by Illuminati members.

The Pilgrims Society

A private organization of elite U.S. and British politicians, diplomats, and business men who host dinners for members each time a new U.S. Ambassador to the United Kingdom or British Ambassador to the United States is chosen in order to indoctrinate them with Illuminati goals.

The Priory of Sion

This alleged organization supposedly hides and protects a secret bloodline of Jesus and Mary Magdalene. The bloodline myth is, in reality, a cover story for the bloodline of what will one day give birth to the antichrist so he can claim the Divine right to rule according to the prophecy of the Old Testament with regards to the bloodline of the messiah.

Satanic Cults and Churches

Organizations like the Church of Satan, the Temple of Set, the Brotherhood of Saturn, the Order of the Golden Dawn, and the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), act as recruiting grounds for entry level occultism.

United Nations

Founded in 1945 after World War II under the premise to prevent war between nations, the UN’s formation began the framework for the New World Order super state.

International Monetary Fund

Based in Washington D.C., the IMF is an international organization that oversees the global financial system and exchange rates and is following the plan to create a single global currency.

The World Bank

A private bank which loans money to developing countries for the purpose of building infrastructure such as roads, schools, water treatment facilities, etc. Often these projects are then taken over by private foreign corporations instead of the host country's government, and run for profit by taking advantage of the population's reliance on such projects.

Foundations

Numerous supposedly non-profit organizations are created and maintained which carry out tasks including research aimed at furthering Illuminati goals and presenting positive public relations to reduce resistance to their implementation. While categorized as non-profit, the directors and leadership of these foundations often earn hefty six figure salaries. The Rockefeller Foundation, for example had $3.7 billion in assets in 2006.

Bank for International Settlements

An international organization of banking institutions that operates as a bank for central banks. As of 2007 the BIS held over $400 billion in assets, including 150 tonnes of gold.

Central Banks

The large banks responsible for the monetary policies of countries and member states. They control the stability of the national currency and money supply, as well as interest rates. They lend money to smaller banks such as your local small town branch.

Global Environmental Facility

An organization consisting of nearly two hundred countries, international institutions, and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), which provides grants related to global warming, land degradation and biodiversity.

Monopoly Corporations

For generations the Illuminati has created and maintained businesses which form monopolies that are relied upon by populations. Oil companies such as Shell Oil, British Petroleum, Exxon Mobile, and others have been their primary cash cows aside from banking. De Beers diamonds and Monsanto are examples from other industries.

Regional Federations

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the European Union (EU), the North American Union (NAU), and others are incremental steps to streamlining laws, trade, and ultimately currency for the New World Order.

The United Grand Lodge of England

Founded in 1717, this is the oldest Masonic Grand Lodge in the world and is the main governing body of Freemasonry in England and Wales. A Grand Lodge, or "Grand Orient," is the governing body of Freemasonry in a particular jurisdiction.

Unity Church

Formally known as the Unity School of Christianity, this is another New Age Christian Church based on a variety of spiritual, metaphysical, and philosophical ideas. It was founded in 1889 by Charles Fillmore.

Unitarian Universalist Association

A liberal religious association of Unitarian Universalist congregations formed by the consolidation of the American Unitarian Association and the Universalist Church of America in 1961.

Unification Church

Founded and lead by Sun Myung Moon, a Korean billionaire who claims to be the second coming of Christ. He is the founder and owner of the Washington Times and gives millions of dollars to U.S. politicians.

Temple of Understanding

A 501 (c) (3) tax exempt non-profit organization founded in 1960 by Juliet Hollister and has representatives with the United Nations who are implementing their eight Millennium Development Goals, they hope, by 2015. They focus on “furthering education for global citizenship.”

Bahai

The Bahai faith is a religious movement started in 19th century Persia with an estimated five to six million followers in more than 200 countries and territories. The teachings emphasize unifying the major world religions.

Rosicrucians

An enlightenment group dating back to the 1400s. While currently not a very powerful organization, the teachings within Rosicrucianism and the activities of its members were important aids in the enlightenment era and the overthrow of the Catholic Church’s rule.

The Aspen Institute

An international non-profit organization founded in 1950 which is dedicated to “fostering enlightened leadership, the appreciation of timeless ideas and values, and open-minded dialogue on contemporary issues.” It is largely financed by the Rockefellers Brothers Fund, (Not to be confused with the Rockefeller Foundation), which was set up in 1940 by the five famous Rockefeller brothers: John D., Nelson, Laurance, Winthrop, and David.

World Trade Organization

The World Trade Organization negotiates, implements, and oversees the rules of trade between nations around the world. 95% of all world trade is policed and governed by the WTO. Labor laws and environmental regulations are circumvented or ignored in poor and undeveloped countries, whose people are taken advantage of by rich countries and multinational corporations through the WTO.

KGB

The Russian Secret Service which operates as an organized crime network and controls Russian leadership, illegal weapons sales, drug running, money laundering, assassinations, and political kingpins.

La Cosa Nostra

The Italian mafia has become somewhat mythical as a result of Hollywood movies, but the mob has worked hand in hand with corrupt politicians, the CIA, Freemasonry, and other elements of the Illuminati in order to make money, eliminate obstacles (assassinations), and to break businesses and worker unions.

FEMA

The Federal Emergency Management Agency gives the president of the United States sweeping powers that in a declared emergency can be used to place citizens in detention centers or prison camps. Police and Military are also given authority to walk door to door in communities and confiscate guns from registered gun owners who are law abiding citizens.

Mossad

Israel’s intelligence agency works hand in hand with the CIA, KGB, and other agencies around the world to coordinate and share information, carry out intimidation and assassinations, and to secretly pull the strings in Israel’s government and with regards to their foreign policies.

UNESCO

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) is an agency of the United Nations established in 1945. Its purpose is to create propaganda and push agendas favorable to the UN and the New World Order. It was responsible for the creation of an agenda supporting a “New World Information and Communication Order” which attempted to curb freedom of the press.

Planetary Congress

The Association of Space Explorers holds a Planetary Congress which is a forum for international astronauts and cosmonauts to exchange technical information concerning space operations, scientific research, mission development and astronaut training.

Environmental Groups

Various environmental groups have been created to push global warming and climate change propaganda which is being used to implement carbon taxes and increased regulations.

Lucis Trust

Originally created as Lucifer’s Trust and renamed years later, the Lucis Trust is one of the premier publishers of New Age books and material. Its headquarters is located on Wall street in New York City, just blocks away from the New York Stock Exchange. One of the most famous books from the company is Alice Bailey’s Externalization of the Hierarchy which is mandatory reading for all Illuminati members.

World Union

Another “non-profit” organization dedicated to paving the path for a New Age unified religion is the World Union, which was founded in 1958. The inspiration of its founders came from Indian mystic Sri Aurobindo.

Esalen Institute

Located in Big Sur, California, this nonprofit organization is dedicated to science that will help humanity realize what Aldous Huxley called the "human potential."

Commission on Global Governance

Founded in 1992 with the support of the United Nations Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, this commission produced the controversial report titled Our Global Neighborhood which called for countries to give up their national sovereignty in order to strengthen the United Nations.

Interpol

The International Criminal Police Organization, better known as Interpol is an organization facilitating international police cooperation. It will ultimately be used to create the New World Order's global soldiers with no allegiance to the country they are working in.

Information Awareness Office

The Information Awareness Office (IAO) was established by the DARPA for the purpose of creating information technology able to monitor and track all electronic communications and transactions under the guise of national security in order to achieve what the office called "total information awareness." The official seal for the office is a pyramid with an all seeing eye as the capstone with a light shining out of it over the entire earth.

Tavistock Institute

A "charity" organization which engages in research and experiments in social science and applied psychology. The institute's primary clients are the British government, the European Union, and private clients interested in manipulating populations and groups of people.

Underground Bases and Tunnels

A series of tunnels and secret bases span the country, possibly the globe, which were created largely by the Army Corps of Engineers. The tunnels are likely equipped with subway type systems which allow individuals to pass underground to different parts of the country in the case of an emergency such as a nuclear attack.

The Project for a New American Century

Founded in 1997 by prominent neocons including Dick Cheney, Paul Wolfowitz, William Kristol, Richard Pearlman and others, this organization produced the infamous Rebuilding America's Defenses documents which recommended a terrorist attack like a new Pearl Harbor would be needed to implement their plans in the Middle East.

Others

Various other private organizations or secret societies masquerading as college fraternities exist as both recruiting grounds for Illuminati supporters, and as a private environment where networking may take place between elite businessmen, politicians, and royalty.

Bibliography

Books

Allen, Gary None Dare Call It Conspiracy 1971 Concord Press

Baddeley, Gavin Lucifer Rising: Sin, Devil Worship, and Rock and Roll 1999 Plexus Publishing ISBN: 0-85965-378-1

Barruel, Abbe Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Vol 3 (1799) Printed by Isaac Collins, for Cornelius Davis, No 94 Water-street

Barruel, Abbe Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Vol 4 (1798) Translated to English by Robert Clifford. Printed by the Translator by T. Burton, No 11, Gate Street, Lincoln's-Inn Field. Sold by E. Booker No. 56, New Bond Street.

Bailey, Alice The Externalization of the Hierarchy Lucis Publishing Company 1957 ISBN: 0-85330-106-9

Bailey, Alice A Treatise on White Magic Lucis Publishing Company (June 1998) ISBN-10: 0853301239

Barton, Blanche - The Secret Life of a Satanist: the Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey) (1990, 1992,) Funeral House ISBN: 0-922915-12-1

Blavatsky, Helena .P. - The Secret Doctrine v. I & II The Theosophical Publishing Company 1888 ISBN: 1-55700-002-06

Brown, Dan Angels and Demons 2000 Pocket Star Books ISBN-10: 0671027360

Burkett, Larry The Illuminati Thomas Nelson; New edition (October 6, 2004) ISBN-10: 1595540016

Christian, Robert Common Sense Renewed 1986 Stoyles Graphic Serves Lake Mills Iowa ISBN: 0-89279-078-4

Crème, Benjamin. The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom. 2007 Share International Foundation ISBN: 90-71484-32-7

Crowley, Aleister. Magick: In Theory and Practice 1979 Smith Peter ISBN: 0844654760

Crowley, Aleister. Book of the Law 1938 Ordo Templi Orientis ISBN: 087728-334-6

DeCamp, John W. The Franklin Cover-up: Child Abuse, Satanism, and Murder in Nebraska ISBN: 0963215809 A W T, Incorporated 1992

Elberton Granite Museum. The Georgia Guidestones "Elberton's Most Unusual Granite Monument" 1980 Elberton Granite Museum and Exhibit Pamphlet. Elberton, GA 30635

Estulin, Daniel The True Story of the Bilderberg Group 2007 TrineDay ISBN: 0-9777953-4-9

Finkbeiner, Ann The Jasons: The Secret History of Science's Postwar Elite (2006) The Penguin Group ISBN: 0-670-03489-4

Gardner, Gerald B. The Book of Shadows

Griffin, G. Edward The Creature from Jekyll Island American Media; 4th edition (2002)

Hall, Manly P. The Lost Keys of Freemasonry: Or, the Secret of Hiram Abiff 1994 ISBN: 0880530448 Macoy Publishing & Masonic Supply Company

Hall, Manly P. The Secret Teachings of All Ages the Philosophical Research Society Press Philosophical Research Society 1999. ISBN: 0893145483

Hanson, Mike. Bohemian Grove: Cult of Conspiracy ISBN: 0595326749 iUniverse 2004

Knight, Christopher & Lomas, Robert - The Book of Hiram Barnes & Noble (2005) ISBN-10: 0760776334

LaVey, Anton The Satanic Bible Avon (December 1, 1976) ISBN-10: 0380015390

Leverett, Mara. The Boys on the Tracks: Death, Denial, and a Mother's Crusade to Bring her Son's Killers to Justice 1999 St. Martin's Press ISBN: 0312198418

Levi, Eliphas. Transcendental Magic: Its Doctrine and Ritual (1910) 1998 Kessinger ISBN: 0766102971

Levi, Eliphas – History of Magic (1913) Red Wheel / Weiser (1999) ISBN-10: 0877289298

Lewin, Leonard C. The Report From Iron Mountain The Dial Press, Inc.; First edition (1967)

Mackey, Albert G The Lexicon of Freemasonry Barnes and Noble Books (2004)

Marks, John. The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate": The CIA and Mind Control, the Secret History of the Behavior Sciences 1979 Norton and Company, New York ISBN: 0393307948

Marrs, Texe. Codex Magica RiverCrest Publishing (November 1, 2005) ISBN-10: 1930004044

Marx, Karl and Fridrich Engels. The Communist Manifesto 1998 Reprinted Oxford University Press Inc. New York Firs published as a World's Classics paperback in 1992 ISBN: 0-19-283437-1

Millegan, Kris. Fleshing our Skull and Bones: Investigations into Americas Most Powerful Secret Society. TrineDay, LLC Walterville, OR 2003 ISBN: 0-9752906-0-6

Miller, Judith Occult Theocrasy (1933) Christian Bookclub of America (Reprinted in 2007)

O'Brien, Cathy Trance Formation of America Fourteenth Edition 1995 Reality Marketing ISBN: 0-9660165-4-8

Orwell, George Nineteen Eighty Four (Centennial Edition) Plume Printing (1983) ISBN: 0-452-28423-6

Ovason, David. The Secret Architecture of our Nation's Capitol:The Masons and the Building of Washington, D.C. 2002 Perennial Currents ISBN: 0060953683

Payson, Seth Proof of the Illuminati Invisible College Press, LLC (January 1, 2003) ISBN-10: 1931468141

Pike, Albert. Morals and Dogma of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite Freemasonry Reprinted by Kesslinger Publishing ISBN: 0-7661-2615-3

Quigley, Caroll Tragedy and Hope A History of the World in Our Time G. S. G. & Associates, Incorporated (June 1975) ISBN-10: 094500110X

Quigley, Caroll Anglo American Establishment 1981 C P A Book Pub ISBN: 0913022454

Rockefeller, David - David Rockefeller: Memoirs 2002 Random House ISBN-10: 0679405887

Robbins, Alexandra Secrets of the Tomb: Skull and Bones, the Ivy League, and the Hidden Paths of Power Back Bay Books (September 4, 2002) ISBN-10: 0316735612

Robison, John. Proofs of a Conspiracy 1798 Boston: Westerland Islands, 1967.

Robertson, Pat. The New World Order Word Publishing USA 1991 ISBN: 0-8499-0915-5

Sauder, Richard Ph. D. Underground Bases and Tunnels: What is the government trying to hide? Adventures Unlimited Press. 1995 ISBN: 0-

932813-37-2

Scnoebelen, William. Masonry: Beyond the Light Chick Publications 1991 ISBN 0-937958-38-7

Simon The Necronomicon Avon (March 1, 1980) ISBN-10: 0380751925

Springmeir, Fritz Bloodlines of the Illuminati 2002 Ambassador House ISBN: 0-9663533-2-3

Sutton, Antony C. America's Secret Establishment: An Introduction to the Order of Skull and Bones Trine Day. 2003 ISBN: 0972020705

Thompson, Hunter S. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas: A Savage Journey to the Heart of the American Dream Vintage; 2nd edition (May 12, 1998) ISBN-10: 0679785892

Tucker, Jim Jim Tucker's Bilderberg Diary American Free Press (2005) ISBN-10: 0974548421

Tulbure, Solomon The Illuminati Manifesto Writers Club Press (December 1, 2001) ISBN-10: 0595210554

Webster, Nesta Secret Societies and Subversive Movements (1924) A&B Publishing Group ISBN 1-881316-88-2

Wilson, Robert Anton The Illuminatus Trilogy: The Eye in the Pyramid, The Golden Apple, Leviathan Dell (December 1, 1983) ISBN-10: 0440539811

Other Documents

Operation Northwoods File can found at the National Security Archives online and is named: Chairman, Join Chiefs of Staff, Justification for US Military Intervention in Cuba [includes cover memoranda], March 13, 1962, TOP SECRET, 15 pp.

http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/news/20010430/

Presidential Daily Briefing August 6, 2001 bin Ladin Determined to Strike in US Declassified on April 10, 2004 after pressure from the September 11th Commission

MKUltra Documents CIA, Memorandum for the Record, Subject: Project ARTICHOKE, January 31, 1975, 5 pp.

Rebuilding Americas Defenses: Strategy, forces resources and for a new century. A report from the Project for the New American Century 2000

From PSYOP to Mindwar: The Psychology of Victory by Colonel Paul E. Valley with Michael A. Aquino Headquarters, 7th Psychological

Operations Group United States Army Reserve Presidio of San Francisco, California 1980

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion

Footnotes

---

[1] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine V I p. 198

[2] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine V I p. 418

[3] The Los Angeles Times Senate approves bailout after revisions, 74-25 October 2 2008

[4] Bloomberg.com Fed Refuses to Disclose Recipients of $2 Trillion December 12th 2008 by Mark Pittman

[5] Bailey, Alice – A Treatise on White Magic p. 412

[6] Barton, Blanch – The Secret Life of a Satanist: The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey pages 24-25

[7] Robison, John – Proofs of a Conspiracy page 9

[8] Robison, John – Proofs of a Conspiracy page 60-61

[9] Robison, John – Proofs of a Conspiracy page 76

[10] Barruel, Abbe – Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Volume III page v

[11] Barruel, Abbe – Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Volume III page vi - vii

[12] Barruel, Abbe – Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Volume III page 5

[13] Barruel, Abbe – Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Volume III page 11

[14] Barruel, Abbe – Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism Volume III page 15

[15] Payson, Seth – Proof of the Illuminati pages 18-19

[16] Payson, Seth – Proof of the Illuminati page 64

[17] Payson, Seth – Proof of the Illuminati page 100

[18] Payson, Seth – Proof of the Illuminati page 114

[19] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page 3-4

[20] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page 4

[21] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page 203

[22] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page 208-209

[23] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page 229

[24] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page 370-371

[25] Webster, Nesta – Secret Societies and Subversive Movements page xii

[26] Miller, Judth – Occult Theocrasy page 31-32

[27] Miller, Judth – Occult Theocrasy page 144

[28] Miller, Judth – Occult Theocrasy page 372

[29] These numbers were taken from the copyright page inside the book.

[30] Allen, Gary – None Dare Call It Conspiracy page 80

[31] Allen, Gary – None Dare Call It Conspiracy page 10-11

[32] Allen, Gary – None Dare Call It Conspiracy page 15

[33] Allen, Gary – None Dare Call It Conspiracy page 16

[34] Allen, Gary – None Dare Call It Conspiracy page 18

[35] Springmeier, Fritz – Bloodlines of the Illuminati page 1

[36] Springmeier, Fritz – Bloodlines of the Illuminati page 1

[37] The Oregonian Deputies, Feds arrest Corbett Couple by Stuart Tomlinson March 2, 2001

[38] The Alex Jones Show (11-10-2004)

[39] Pike, Albert – Morals and Dogma p. 697

[40] Pike, Albert – Morals and Dogma p. 104-105

[41] Pike, Albert – Morals and Dogma p. 321

[42] Pike, Albert – Morals and Dogma p. 102

[43] Pike, Albert – Morals and Dogma p. 213

[44] Pike, Albert – Morals and Dogma page 103

[45] Hall, Manly P. – The Secret Teachings of All Ages p. 282

[46] Hall, Manly P. – The Secret Teachings of All Ages p. 283

[47] Hall, Manly P. – The Secret Teachings of All Ages page 40

[48] Hall, Manly P. – The Lost Keys Of Freemasonry page 124

[49] Hanson, Mike – Bohemian Grove: Cult of Conspiracy p. 194

[50] Ibid

[51] About the author section on inside cover of Common Sense Renewed (1986)

[52] Christian, Robert – Common Sense Renewed p. 14-15

[53] Quigley, Carroll – Tragedy and Hope 950

[54] Quigley, Carroll – Tragedy and Hope 951-952

[55] Quigley, Carroll – Tragedy and Hope pages 1247-1248

[56] Quigley, Carroll – Tragedy and Hope page 324

[57] Sutton, Antony – America's Secret Establishment Author's Preface page vii

[58] Ibid

[59] Sutton, Antony – America's Secret Establishment page 31

[60] Sutton, Antony – America's Secret Establishment page 6

[61] Sutton, Antony – America's Secret Establishment page 7

[62] Sutton, Antony – America's Secret Establishment page 25

[63] Millegan, Kris – Fleshing out Skull and Bones page 413

[64] Robbins, Alexandra – Secrets of the Tomb p.181

[65] Robbins, Alexandra – Secrets of the Tomb p. 182

[66] Griffin, G. Edward – The Creature from Jekyll Island p. 23

[67] Griffin, G. Edward – The Creature from Jekyll Island p. 164-165

[68] Barton, Blanche – The Secret Life of a Satanist: The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey page 98

[69] The title “doctor,” in this case, comes from a tradition of calling whorehouse piano players “Doc” and does not refer to an academic title.

[70] Baddeley, Gavin – Lucifer Rising p. 226

[71] Barton, Blanche – The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey p. 92

[72] Crowley, Aleister – The Book of the Law page 41

[73] Crowley, Aleister – The Book of the Law page 47

[74] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v I. p. xvii

[75] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. I p. 73

[76] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. II p. 162

[77] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. II p. 235

[78] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. II p. 237

[79] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. II p. 387

[80] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. II p. 512

[81] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine v. II p. 513

[82] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 21

[83] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 409

[84] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 417

[85] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 417

[86] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 418

[87] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 513

[88] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 511

[89] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 570-571

[90] Bailey, Alice – Externalization of the Hierarchy p. 519-520

[91] Marrs, Texe – Codex Magica page 25

[92] Marrs, Texe – Codex Magica page 26

[93] Tucker, Jim – Jim Tuckers Bilderberg Diary preface

[94] The Alex Jones Show May 27, 2005 on the Genesis Communications Network

[95] Estulin, Daniel – The True Story of the Bilderberg Group page xiv

[96] Estulin, Daniel – The True Story of the Bilderberg Group page xv

[97] Marks, John – The Search for the Manchurian Candidate page xix

[98] Marks, John – The Search for the Manchurian Candidate page 195

[99] Crème, Benjamin – The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom p. 25

[100] Crème, Benjamin – The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom page 82

[101] Crème, Benjamin – The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom p. 190-191

[102] A Closer Look with Michael Corbin April 12, 2005

[103] Alex Jones Show July 21, 2004 Alex Jones Interviews John DeCamp, Author of "The Franklin Cover-up"

[104] Wilson, Colin – Crypt of Cthulhu magazine issue #23 (1984) The Necronomicon—The Origin of a Spoof

[105] Hall, Manly P. – The Secret Teaching of All Ages page 96

[106] Hall, Manly P. – The Secret Teaching of All Ages page 97

[107] Tulbure, Solomon – The Illuminati Manifesto page ix-x

[108] Knoxville News Sentinel Police ID dead man found on interstate November 19, 2004 by Randy Kenner

[109] Ibid

[110] Ibid

[111] Tulbure, Solomon – The Illuminati Manifesto page 267

[112] Tulbure, Solomon – The Illuminati Manifesto page 266

[113] Tulbure, Solomon – The Illuminati Manifesto page xviii

[114] Blavatsky, Helena – The Secret Doctrine Volume 1 page xxxvii

[115] U.S. News and World Report Hoax or Horror? A Book that Shook the White House November 20, 1967

[116] NY Times Book Review The Guest Word Mach 19, 1972 by Leonard Lewin

[117] The Washington Post News of War and Peace You're Not Ready For by Herschel McLandress November 26, 1967, p. 5.

[118] Lewin, Leonard – The Report from Iron Mountain page 66-67

[119] Washington Post When Seeing and Hearing Isn't Believing By William M. Arkin Feb. 1, 1999

[120] Lewin, Leonard – The Report from Iron Mountain page 67

[121] Levi, Eliphas – Transcendental Magic p. 7-8

[122] Levi, Eliphas – Transcendental Magic p. 307

[123] Hall, Manly P. – The Secret Teachings of All Ages p. 316

[124] Night & Lomas – The Book of Hiram p. 434

[125] Levi, Eliphas – History of Magic p. 211

[126] Christianity Today February 2,1979 The Legend(s) of John Todd

[127] Ibid

[128] Cornerstone Magazine The John Todd Story by Gary Metz [Issue 48]

[129] Schnoebelen, William – Exposing the Illuminati from Within (1:26:10)

[130] Schnoebelen, Bill – Interview with an Ex-Vampire (part 1, 23:33)

[131] YouTube: Bill Clinton Admits Government Mind Control Experiments

[132] Miami Herald Army Re-Opening Probe Against Officer in Child Sex Case December 24, 1988

[133] Interview with Michael Corbin, host of A Closer Look

[134] Makow, Henry Chinese Secret Society Challenges Illuminati Rense.com 6-30-07

[135] Ibid

[136] Ibid

[137] Ibid

[138] Ibid

[139] http://www.halturnershow.blogspot.com/2008/12/urgent-new-amero-paper-currency-exposed.html

[140] Ibid

[141] The Washington Times GOP Candidate's remarks rile Reagan October 7, 1982

[142] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 26

[143] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 19-20

[144] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 26

[145] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 27

[146] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 72

[147] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 75

[148] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 81

[149] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 83

[150] Finkbeiner, Ann – The Jasons: The Secret History of Science's Postwar Elite page 100

[151] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 85

[152] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 94

[153] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 178

[154] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 94

[155] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 33

[156] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 28

[157] http://pdharris.com/cooper/fraud_hoax_fight.htm

[158] Cooper, William – Behold a Pale Horse page 36

[159] Associated Press/The Arizona Republic Militia Leader Killed, Deputy Wounded During Attempted Arrest November 06, 2001

[160] At the time of this writing in April 2009, many have not heard of the Illuminati. Angels & Demons the movie and other fictionalizations of the Illuminati may bring the subject matter into the mainstream, but in a tainted and fictionalized way.

[161] Washington Post Rush Limbaugh Signs $400 Million Radio Deal by Paul Farhi July 3, 2008; Page C01

[162] http://cody.blogs.foxbusiness.com/2008/12/15/Illuminating-the-Illuminati-charles-schumer-and-barney-frank-are-owned-by-the-big-banks

[163] CNN Descendant sues Skull and Bones over Geronimo's bones February 26, 2009

[164] http://magma.nationalgeographic.com/ngm/bestvintage/photogallery_02.html

[165] CNN Kissinger resigns as head of 9/11 commission December 13, 2002

[166] President Bush Speaks to United Nations 11/10/2001 Press Release

[167] Audio tapes of President Johnson's private phone conversations have been released and are available for download at the National Archives website. Below is the exact url. http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB132/tapes.htm

[168] USA TODAY Conspiracy film rewrites Sept. 11 4/29/2006 By William M. Welch

[169] Vanity Fair Click Here For Conspiracy August 1, 2006 by Nancy Jo Sales

[170] Time Magazine Why the 9/11 Conspiracy Theories Won't Go Away by Lev Grossman Sunday, Sep. 03, 2006

[171] Robbins, William – A Lurid, Mysterious Scandal Begins Taking Shape in Omaha. The New York Times. December 18, 1988

[172] Ibid

[173] Caradori's Airplane Broke up in Flight, Omaha World-Herald. Omaha, NE: July 12, 1990. Page 01

[174] Security Analysis of the Diebold AccuBasic Interpreter (page 2) by David Wagner, David Jefferson, Matt Bishop, Voting Systems Technology Assessment Advisory Board (VSTAAB) with the assistance of: Chris Karlof Naveen Sastry, University of California, Berkeley, February 14, 2006

[175] London Observer – British link to 'snuff' videos October 1, 2000 by Jason Burke in London, Amelia Gentleman in Moscow, Philip Willan in Rome

[176] Ibid

[177] King, Francis –The Magical World of Aleister Crowley, page 78

[178] YouTube video "Robert Anton Wilson on Conspiracy Theories"

[179] YouTube video "Robert Anton Wilson Talks about Aleister Crowley"

[180] Robert Anton Wilson Contemporary Authors Online, Gale, 2007. Reproduced in Biography Resource Center. Farmington Hills, Mich.:

Thomson Gale. 2007

[181] Brown, Dan – Angels & Demons page 38

[182] Brown, Dan – Angels & Demons page 39

[183] Brown, Dan – Angels & Demons page 40-41

[184] Galileo died in 1642 and Bernini died in 1680

[185] Brown, Dan – Angels & Demons page 41

[186] http://www.randomhouse.com/catalog/display.pperl?isbn=9780739326756

[187] The London Times German media giant grew fat on Nazi propaganda by Roger Boyes October 9, 2002

[188] A Closer Look with Michael Corbin April 12, 2005

[189] DeCamp, John – The Franklin Cover-Up page 105

[190] http://www.pw.org/mag/pc_thompson.htm

[191] Orwell, George – Nineteen Eighty-Four page 73-74

[192] Orwell, George – Nineteen Eighty-Four page 156

[193] Orwell, George – Nineteen Eighty-Four page 213

[194] The Register Google developing eavesdropping software: Audio 'fingerprint' for content-relevant ads September 3, 2006

[195] Jackson, Steve. “Illuminati Designer Article” Steve Jackson Games http://www.sjgames.com/illuminati/designart.html

[196] http://www.sjgames.com/SS/

[197] http://www.davidicke.com/content/view/4384/48/

[198] Lardner, George – On the Set: Dallas in Wonderland, The Washington Post 5-19-1991

[199] Petras, James (May 1992). “The Discrediting of the Fifth Estate: The Press Attacks on JFK,” Cineaste, pp. 15

[200] Ebert, Roger (1991-12-20). “JFK”, Chicago Sun-Times.

[201] Weinraub, Bernard (1992-04-02). “Valenti Calls J.F.K. ‘Hoax’ and ‘Smear’”, The New York Times

[202] Ebert, Roger (2004-12-15). “Ebert’s 10 Best Lists: 1967-present,” Chicago Sun-Times

[203] Reeves, Phil (1992-01-20). “Top award for Kennedy film”, The Independent, p. 12.

[204] This was a reference to the VeriChip implantable RFID tag which is designed to do just that.

[205] CNET News FBI taps cell phone mic as eavesdropping tool By Delcan McCullagh and Anne Broache December 1, 2006

[206] Kansas City Star "Rescue Me" character believes 9/11 was an inside job ... and so does the actor playing him January 19, 2009

[207] Ibid

[208] Ibid

[209] New York Times Plot Echoes One Planned by 9/11 Mastermind in '94 by Ramond Bonner August 10, 2006

[210] http://www.ballerstatus.com/article/news/2008/06/4838/

"Acute and perceptive."
NOAM CHOMSKY

IRREGULAR ARMY

HOW THE US MILITARY RECRUITED

IRREGULAR ARMY

How the US Military Recruited Neo-Nazis, Gang Members and Criminals to Fight the War on Terror

Matt Kennard

VERSO

London • New York

First published by Verso 2012

© Matt Kennard 2012

All rights reserved

The moral rights of the author have been asserted

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

Verso

UK: 6 Meard Street, London W1F 0EG

US: 20 Jay Street, Suite 1010, Brooklyn, NY 11201

www.versobooks.com

Verso is the imprint of New Left Books

Ebook ISBN: 978-1-84467-905-8

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Kennard, Matt.

Irregular army : how the US military recruited Neo-Nazis, gangs, and criminals to fight the war on terror / Matt Kennard.

p. cm.

ISBN 978-1-84467-880-8 (hbk. : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-84467-905-8 (ebook)

1. United States—Armed Forces—Enlisting, recruiting, etc.—Standards. 2. United States—Armed Forces—Enlisting, recruiting, etc.—Corrupt practices. 3. Soldiers—Health and hygiene—United States—Standards. 4. Physical fitness—United States—Standards. 5. Soldiers—Alcohol use—United States. 6. Soldiers—Drug use—United States. 7. Gang members—United States. I. Title.

UB333K46 2012

956.7044’34—dc23

2012018558

For all the people whose lives have been ended or brutalized by these wars

An Army raised without proper regard to the choice of its recruits was never yet made good by length of time; and we are now convinced by fatal experience that this is the source of all our misfortunes.

Flavius Vegetius Renatus, in his military manual
De Re Militari, fifth century, as the decline of the Roman Empire began in earnest

He served up our great military a huge bowl of chicken feces, and ever since then, our military and our country have been trying to turn this bowl into chicken salad.

Retired General John Batiste, former commander of the First Infantry division in Iraq, on Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, 2006

Contents

Acknowledgments

Introduction: Breaking Down

1 The Other "Don't Ask, Don't Tell"
Hitler in Iraq
Straight Outta Baghdad
War Criminals

2 Sick, Addicted, and Forsaken
Sippin' on Gin and Hajji Juice
Collateral Damage Comes Home

3 Plump, Young, Dumb—and Ready to Serve
The Baghdad Bulge
Intelligence Ops
Child Soldiers
Grandpa Goes to War

4 Outsiders
Green Card Soldiers
Ask, Tell

Epilogue: Indiscriminate Trust

Notes
Index
Photo insert

Acknowledgments

This is my first book and it spent a long time germinating before it was finally written. Because of that there are lots of people all over the world who helped me make it real as I worked to focus the issues involved. There are two people particularly without whom this book would have been impossible. Jason Yarn helped me put the idea together from its tentative beginnings with great patience and kindness, while Max Ajl gave his time and skills selflessly at the start of the project. Lionel Barber, David Crouch, and Jo Rollo at the Financial Times were generous and understanding when I needed time to write.

Most thanks and love to my parents, Judy and Peter, for teaching me always to stand up for what you believe in and in turn believing in both this project and me. In their own different ways, they have dedicated their whole lives to trying to make the world a better place—they are my inspiration. Ana for her love, being the best editor and kindest person too, and more than anyone else making this book what it is. Thanks to my brother Daniel for his unwavering belief that I could do anything I set out to do. My grandma Mary has been steadfast in her support and love all my life—I couldn't have done this without her. Thanks, Nan. Back when this was a seed of an idea Gizem helped me nurture it and was a voice I turned to throughout for sound advice.

Many thanks also to Andrew Hsiao at Verso for his insights into the topic and support throughout the process. Tariq Ali likewise showed faith in the project early on, while Tim Clark improved the final product immeasurably with his stellar editing. The guidance and wisdom of Beech was a constant support the whole way, alongside Rab whose intellectual truculence has taught me a lot over the years. The project started at Columbia University Journalism School where I was taught by Sheila Coronel, who afforded me the financial and intellectual support at the beginning when I was still staring at a blank page. The Nation Institute deserve huge thanks for giving me the financial and moral support needed to continue the initial story—democracy and journalism around the world would be hugely improved if every country could have an institution like the Institute. Salon published the first short story which gave birth to this book, so thanks to them and in particular Kevin Berger. There are also those who have kept me sane and laughing while writing, so thanks to: Tom, Nick T., Dave, Jake, Pilar, Steve, Frankie, Patrick, Declan, Billy, Whybrow, Al D., Shane, Ivor, Adam, Lex, Summer, Eugene, Jack, Laurence, Harry, Charlie, Chris, Leah, Ralph, Camilla, Hugh, Lucy, Suey, William, and Shannon.

War is the most traumatic event a human being can experience. That goes for those attacked and for those individuals sent to do the attacking. I would like to thank all the veterans who have come home and dedicated their post-combat lives to stopping these wars and fighting for the health and educational benefits that are rightfully theirs. This book is not an indictment of all US service members; it is an indictment of the people who sent them to war on the basis of a lie and knowingly allowed the whole institution to unravel.

It goes without saying none of the people above are responsible for what I have written.

Introduction: Breaking Down

I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they are close to breaking.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, 2006[1]

On September 10, 2001, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld stood in front of the assembled great and good of the Pentagon and delivered an expansive lecture entitled Bureaucracy to Battlefield.[2] Its prescriptions were extremely radical—among the most portentous in US military history—but thanks to the terrorist atrocities the following day his words remain buried deep in the memory hole, while their consequences are buried under the sands of Iraq and Afghanistan. "The topic today is an adversary that poses a threat, a serious threat, to the security of the United States of America," Rumsfeld began, before revealing the threat to be not Al-Qaeda, but the "Pentagon bureaucracy." "Not the people, but the processes," he added reassuringly. "Not the civilians, but the systems. Not the men and women in uniform, but the uniformity of thought and action that we too often impose on them." In essence, Rumsfeld's speech that day was designed to lay the ground and soften up his workers for a massive privatization of the Department of Defense's services. It was the realization of a long-held dream for Republican politicians and their corporate allies in Washington—who would now be presented with a sweet shop full of lucrative government contracts to chew on. With the tragic events of the next day and the ensuing two-front ground war in the Middle East, Rumsfeld was gifted the perfect opportunity to enact his program with minimal opposition. The results were clear eight years into the War on Terror when the DOD (Department of Defense) had 95,461 private contractors working for them in Iraq compared to 95,900 US military personnel.[3] The use of private contractors was by then so embedded that Barack Obama's initial skepticism about their use displayed while a senator became one more item in a long list of policy climbdowns. But while the privatization of the war effort is a topic that has been explored extensively by a number of journalists, notably Jeremy Scahill,[4] one aspect of the program has received little coverage—namely Rumsfeld's plan for soldiers on the payroll of the DOD. Equally radical, it was a scheme that would prove catastrophic for the troops and the occupied populations living under them. Veiled in the language of business-style efficiency savings, Rumsfeld's plan was intended to eviscerate the US military, which was to become merely an appendage to the massive private forces the US would employ in the future.

"In this period of limited funds," he continued, "we need every nickel, every good idea, every innovation, every effort to help modernize and transform the US military."

This could only be done by changing the basics of how the Pentagon worked, in a process that would later be dubbed "Transformation": "Many of the skills we most require are also in high demand in the private sector, as all of you know. To compete, we need to bring the Department of Defense the human resources practices that have already transformed the private sector." Even the DOD itself was to be run like a corporation: "We must employ the tools of modern business. More flexible compensation packages, modern recruiting techniques and better training." What Rumsfeld desired was a scaled-down, streamlined US military—a reversal of what had become known as the Powell Doctrine, named for the Desert Storm general Colin Powell, who believed in high troop numbers, "overwhelming force," and a defined exit strategy. It was a risky approach for Rumsfeld to take. Even before 9/11, Powell, by now Secretary of State, had observed that "our armed forces are stretched rather thin, and there is a limit to how many of these deployments we can sustain."[5] That would prove to be an understatement. But Rumsfeld was backed in his new approach by his boss, President George W. Bush, who much to Powell's consternation shared the same vision. "Building tomorrow's force is not going to be easy. Changing the direction of our military is like changing the course of a mighty ship," Bush said in May 2001.[6]

The oft-repeated cliché is that everything changed on September 11, and indeed it did for millions of Americans. But not for Rumsfeld: his priorities stayed the same while his popularity surged after he was pictured helping victims of the attack at the Pentagon into ambulances. He now had not only the ultimate cover for changing the course of the mighty ship and designing a pared-down business-style war machine, but also the perfect laboratory for his experiments. The war drums began beating in earnest soon after 9/11. The invasion of Afghanistan began with a Rumsfeld-inspired Special Forces mission to bribe local warlords, supported by airstrikes obviating the need for "overwhelming" manpower. But the so-called neoconservatives weren't finished yet: they had their eyes on the ultimate prize of Iraq and, sure enough, eighteen months later and much more controversially, the country with the third-largest reserves of oil in the world was attacked—a move Rumsfeld's deputy Paul Wolfowitz had been advocating (again, with a Rumsfeld-style small force) in the 1990s. Over the next decade, US bombs fell on Syria and Pakistan and Yemen, among others, as the Middle East turned into a conflagration of Dantesque proportions, with civilians, insurgents, and US service members all caught up in the blaze.

Rumsfeld's guinea pigs for his new experiment in "flexible" military planning were the patriotic Americans who believed they were signing up to defend their country—at the height of the War on Terror, 1.6 million of them had served in the Middle East.[7] That number, equivalent to the population of a country like Estonia or a city like Philadelphia, must have come as a surprise to Rumsfeld, who had predicated his whole war plan on a much smaller force and a short war. In fact, soon after 9/11, General Tommy Franks had been asked by Rumsfeld to estimate how many troops an invasion of Iraq would require. The last contingency plan for invading Iraq, dating from 1998, had recommended a force of more than 380,000. But, apparently under pressure from Rumsfeld, General Franks presented his "Generated Start" plan with an initial troop count of just 275,000.[8] Even that was too much for Rumsfeld, who in typical peremptory fashion slapped down the general and pushed for an even smaller force. According to Michael Gordon, military correspondent for the New York Times, "They came up with a variant called the running start, where you begin maybe with a division or so, and then the reinforcements would flow behind it. So, you start small but you just keep sending more of what you need."[9] This approach generated what was called a "war within a war," as it pitted Rumsfeld against General Eric Shinseki, the army's popular Chief of Staff, and Secretary of State Powell, both of whom (rightly) believed that large numbers of troops would be needed to ensure security after the initial fighting was over. General Shinseki publicly proposed a force of 200,000, after his frustration with Rumsfeld's intransigence on the issue became insufferable.[10] It didn't matter. Rumsfeld wouldn't listen.

This tactic was so blinded by ideology that it directly contradicted the ostensible goals of the invasion—disarming Saddam Hussein. "The United States did not have nearly enough troops to secure the hundreds of suspected WMD sites that had supposedly been identified in Iraq or to secure the nation's long, porous borders," said Michael Gordon and General Bernard Trainor in their book Cobra II. "Had the Iraqis possessed WMD and terrorist groups been prevalent in Iraq as the Bush administration so loudly asserted, [the limited number of] U.S. forces might well have failed to prevent the WMD from being spirited out of the country and falling into the hands of the dark forces the administration had declared war against."[11] But it wasn't just ideology that was to blame for the ensuing damage to the US military and its war aims; there was a sizeable dose of incompetence as well. Declassified war-planning documents from the US Central Command in August 2002 show how ill-prepared the Bush administration was for the occupation which was to follow. The plan they put together assumed that by December 2006 the US military would be almost completely drawn down from Iraq, leaving a residual force of just 5,000 troops.[12] It was madness, but nevertheless music to Rumsfeld's ears.

After much wrangling, Rumsfeld and Franks compromised and the initial force numbered 130,000, much smaller than had been envisioned in the 1990s, but not as slim as Rumsfeld had hoped. It didn't go to plan anyway, and the troop levels were not enough to get a handle on this country of 30 million people. Incrementally more service members were sent out alongside private contractors as the situation descended into chaos after the first viceroy Paul Bremner's decommissioning of the police and military sparked endless violence. By 2005, the US had 150,000 troops deployed in Iraq, and 19,500 in Afghanistan. But the war plan meant the military wasn't prepared in any way for this kind of extended deployment—and it was unraveling. In 2005, just two years into the war in Iraq, people were talking openly about the fact that the US military had reached breaking point. At a Senate hearing in March of that year, General Richard A. Cody expressed these concerns publicly: "What keeps me awake at night is what will this all-volunteer force look like in 2007."[13] But he didn't know the half of it. Worse was to come as in the same year the army missed its recruitment targets by the largest margin since 1979, a time when US society was still afflicted with so-called "Vietnam Syndrome" and the army was much bigger and recruiting twice as many soldiers.

Breaking Point

Around this time a retired army officer named Andrew F. Krepinevich, writing under a Pentagon contract, released a shocking report which was scathing about the US military being able to maintain its troop levels in Iraq without breaking the military or losing the war. His diagnosis was simple: the US armed forces were "confronted with a protracted deployment against irregular forces waging insurgencies," but the ground forces required to provide stability and security in Afghanistan and Iraq "clearly exceed those available for the mission."[14] To compensate, the army was introducing change by the back door at the expense of their troops. Krepinevich pointed to the frequent and untimely redeployment of service members. "Soldiers and brigades are being deployed more frequently, and for longer periods, than what the Army believes is appropriate in order to attract and retain the number of soldiers necessary to maintain the size and quality of the force asking."[15] He offered three solutions for overcoming the desperate shortage of troops: redeploy existing troops more frequently still; redeploy them for even longer; or deploy US Marine ground troops. The first two of these prescriptions had already been undertaken by the army, but it was a dangerous game. "How often can a soldier be put in harm's way and still desire to remain in the Army?" Krepinevich asked. "It is not clear, even to Army leaders, how long this practice can be sustained without inducing recruitment and retention problems."[16] His conclusions were not optimistic: the army, he said, was "in a race against time," in which "its ability to execute long-term initiatives" was compromised by the "risk [of] 'breaking' the force in the form of a catastrophic decline in recruitment and retention."[17] He continued that it would be difficult not to stress the active and reserve components "so severely that recruiting and retention problems become so severe as to threaten the effectiveness of the force."[18] By now, then, everyone—including even Rumsfeld himself—knew the army had to increase in size. "With today's demands placing such a high strain on our service members, it becomes more crucial than ever that we work to alleviate their burden," said Representative Ike Skelton (D-MO), who had a long track record of advocating for a bigger army.[19] But with recruitment down and anger at the war widespread how could this be done?

There was one course of action that would have instantly sewn up the military's unraveling seams, namely: the draft. But it was too controversial. Involuntary conscription had been abolished by Congress in 1973 at the end of the Vietnam War. At the time Krepinevich was writing, it did enter into the national conversation, although the Bush administration remained implacably opposed for reasons of naked self-interest. When Rumsfeld testified at a Senate Appropriations Defense Subcommittee in April 2005 the issue was raised by Senator Daniel Inouye (D-HI). "For the first time in many years the Army and Marine Corps are not meeting their recruiting targets. There are some who are already discussing the draft," he said with diplomatic tact. An exasperated Rumsfeld shuffled forward in his seat and put his mouth closer to the microphone: "I think the only people who could conceivably be talking about a draft are people who are speaking from pinnacles of near-perfect ignorance," he replied. "The last thing we need is a draft. We just don't."[20]

The Democrats kept pushing until Charles Rangel, a Congressman from New York, reintroduced the Draft Bill in February 2006, which if passed would have reinstated conscription for all those up to forty-two years old. "Every day that the military option is on the table, as declared by the president in his State of the Union address, in Iran, North Korea, and Syria, reinstatement of the military draft is an option that must also be considered, whether we like it or not," said Rangel. "If the military is already having trouble getting the recruits they need, what can we do to fill the ranks if the war spreads from Iraq to other countries? We may have no other choice but a draft."[21] It was rejected by Congress, much to the delight of President Bush. "I applaud the House of Representatives for soundly rejecting the 'Reinstate the Draft' bill," he said in the aftermath. "If this bill were presented to me, I would veto it. America's all-volunteer military is the best in the world, and reinstating the draft would be bad policy. We have increased pay and benefits to ensure that our troops have the resources they need to fight and win the war on terror. I want every American to understand that, as long as I am President, there will be no draft."[22] Reinstating it wouldn't have made the US an anomaly among its allies: many still run compulsory conscription programs, including Israel and (until 2011) Germany. The draft also has deep roots in the US historical narrative: during the Civil War, America's greatest president, Abraham Lincoln, had put forward the Conscription Act which called for the military service of all healthy males between the ages of twenty-five and forty-five for a three-year term. But the opposition from President Bush and his administration should be understood from the perspective of the still-raw memories many Americans have of the last draft. In a war so unpopular and with a president under so much pressure, the administration was aware that conscripting the nation's youth into the military could well be the straw that broke the camel's back. In a 2006 CBS poll, 68 percent of respondents said they opposed reinstating the military draft.[23]

The Vietnam-era draft has also come under concerted attack ever since that war because of its targeted recruitment of certain demographics in the American population. Roughly 80 percent of the soldiers sent to Indochina were from working-class and/or ethnic minority backgrounds.[24] One Vietnam veteran, Mike Clodfelter, who grew up in Plainville, Kansas, wrote in his 1976 memoir: "From my own small home town . . . all but two of a dozen high school buddies would eventually serve in Vietnam and all were of working class families, while I knew of not a single middle class son of the town's businessmen, lawyers, doctors, or ranchers from my high school graduating class who experienced the Armageddon of our generation."[25] Even though the draft was never reinstated during the War on Terror, there were symmetries with recruitment trends from the Vietnam era. In the War on Terror, the US military again focused on enlisting society's poorest. Denied the draft, however, it fell back on another method learned from attempts to swell the ranks during Vietnam: changing the regulations on enlistment. In 1965, as the troop buildup in South Vietnam grew, the military started to abandon its standards for recruitment and hundreds of thousands of men who scored among the lowest IQ percentiles were admitted for the first time. "Prior to American escalation in Vietnam such men were routinely rejected, but with a war on these 'new standards' were suddenly declared fit to fight. Rejection rates plummeted," writes one historian.[26] In 1966, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara instituted a program called "Project 100,000," which aimed to increase the levels of troops by that number within two years by admitting civilians who had previously not met the required standards.[27]

The New Look

Without conscription and with recruitment targets being consistently missed, the Bush administration and the Pentagon devised a similar plan. By subcontracting out myriad operational tasks to private military institutions like Blackwater and DynCorp, who received billions of dollars in government largesse to man the frontlines in the War on Terror, the government had partially dealt with the gap between its demand for cannon fodder and the supply of quality troops. A thin coalition of countries, later including NATO troops in Afghanistan and the UN in Iraq, helped ameliorate the chronic troop deficits. But it wasn't enough. In 2004, Bush took another unusual step to plug the hole: he called up 37,000 members of the National Guard to go to fight in the deserts of Iraq.[28] Not since the Korean War had there been such a mobilization: the National Guard had served in the Gulf War and Kosovo, but in nowhere near such huge numbers. By June 2005, they accounted for 45 percent of the total army in Iraq.[29] Then there were the monetary inducements, which became quite lucrative for service members and crippling for the Pentagon. The Rand Corporation conducted an in-depth study which found that the DOD budget for enlistment and reenlistment bonuses had skyrocketed between 2000 to 2008, more than doubling to $1.4 billion for reenlistment bonuses. The average army enlistment bonus increased from $5,600 to about $18,000 per soldier over the same period.[30] In just three years, from 2006 to 2009, the army dispensed with $1 billion to recruit 64,526 active-duty and reserve soldiers. Army Reserve recruits saw their bonuses more than double over the same period, to $19,500. But the study also found that in the army recruiters themselves tend to be a more cost-effective way to swell the ranks of the military than enlistment bonuses or pay increases. The Bush administration took that route too. To achieve its 2007 goals, the army increased its 8,000-strong recruiting force with 2,000 new assistants.[31]

At the same time—and perhaps most importantly—those who should have been kicked out were being allowed to stay. In June 2005, the Wall Street Journal turned up an internal memo to senior commanders which called the growing dropout rate—called "attrition" in military jargon—"a matter of great concern." "We need your concerted effort to reverse the negative trend," it read. "By reducing attrition 1%, we can save up to 3,000 initial-term soldiers. That's 3,000 more soldiers in our formations." It was an explicit call to drop standards: the message being that soldiers addicted to alcohol and drugs, those who lose their fitness, or their mental poise, shouldn't be discharged. It was batten down the hatches time. The Wall Street Journal quoted a battalion commander as saying: "It is the guys on weight control . . . school no-shows, drug users, etc., who eat up my time and cause my hair to grey prematurely . . . Often they have more than one of these issues simultaneously."[32] Such sentiments did not occur in a vacuum. Rumsfeld and the Pentagon were, in fact, allowing the dismantling of the whole regulatory structure for enlistment and retention that the US armed forces had built up in the twenty-five years since Vietnam. The slim military needed fattening up and this was the only way to do it. In the end it constituted a complete re-evaluation of who was qualified to serve in the US armed forces, a full-works facelift of the service unheard of in the annals of modern American history. In the relatively halcyon days of the First Gulf War in 1990, the US military blocked the enlistment of felons. It spurned men and women with low IQs or those without a high school diploma. It would either block the enlistment of or kick out neo-Nazis and gang members. It would treat or discharge alcoholics, drug abusers, and the mentally ill. It would pass up the services of foreign citizens to fight its wars. No more. While the Bush administration adopted conservative policies pretty much universally, it saved its ration of liberalism for the US military, where it scrapped all the previously sacrosanct regulations governing recruitment to the most powerful fighting force in the world. Under the aegis of the War on Terror, the US armed forces became a Mecca for the "different," the weird and wonderful (and dangerous) of America.

Throughout all this, however, the military maintained a rictus, everything-in-order, smile for the public. As late as August 2007, when the crisis befalling the institution had become widely known, Michael Dominguez, Principal Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, began his testimony to a Congressional hearing with a slap on the back for the US military: "Let me begin by acknowledging an historic achievement that many, including some of our own experts, would have thought impossible a few years ago," he said. "We have taken an all-volunteer military to war. We have done it in a strong economy with 4.5 percent unemployment. We often have asked that force and their families to do more on short notice. And through it all, we have manned this nation's military with people far above average relative to their peers."[33] It was simply untrue. The average member of the US military was no longer far above their average peer. The following chapters will show how the Bush administration, together with a pliant Pentagon (and the succeeding Obama administration), enabled the US military to undergo the biggest and fastest transformation in its history. Each chapter will cover a different group of people who have been enfranchised through the War on Terror as the US military scrambled for troops. The different weightings and amount of reporting on each group reflects the fact that some of these changes in regulation have been explicit (for example, rules on body weight and IQ) while others have been completely denied (from neo-Nazis to gang members). Still others have been hushed up as far as possible—such as the vast numbers of young Americans scarred for life by mental illness, left untreated and forsaken.

It will become clear quite quickly that it is not just American soldiers who have been short-changed by Rumsfeld's vision—the occupied populations have been sacrificed with rivers of their own blood. Many of the wars' worst atrocities are linked directly to the loosening of enlistment regulations on criminals, racist extremists, and gang members, among others. Then there is the domestic US population, which has had to put up with military-trained gang members marauding around their cities; as well as Mexican civilians who have paid with their lives in the drug wars facilitated in part by the US military. The effects of this will be felt for decades to come. Finally, there's the safety of the troops themselves. Loosening standards on intelligence and body weight, for example, compromised the military's operational readiness and undoubtedly endangered the lives of American and allied troops. Hundreds of young Americans may have paid with their lives for this folly.

US society changed profoundly after the September 11 attacks and during the subsequent wars. In many ways, the military is a reflection of the society from which it is drawn, and the changes in the composition of the US military and its regulations over this period reflected a country in political, cultural, and economic reverse gear. As America became increasingly bigoted and inward-looking, so radicalism in the US military increased. As young people became ever fatter, so too did the soldiers. As the criminal justice system locked more and more people up, so the military had to increase the numbers of felons it allowed in. "Today's young men and women are more overweight . . . and are being charged for offenses that in earlier years wouldn't have been considered a serious offense, and might not have resulted in charges in the first place," an army spokesman complained in 2008.[34] At the height of the War on Terror, only one in three men in the general population met the pre-9/11 physical, mental, educational, and other eligibility requirements needed to enlist in the armed forces. "The numbers of people who meet our enlistment standards is astonishingly low," grumbled Under Secretary Dominguez at the end of his testimony lauding the military's success.[35] To enlist the rest, the US military had to change in profound and dangerous ways.

What follows, then, is a soldier's-eye history of the War on Terror, told by the men and women who have often paid the highest price (alongside, of course, the occupied populations). Through it all, the military rationalized its transformation program as an altruistic democratization of the fighting force or denied outright they had loosened regulations. "In the 1990s what you saw was they just kept raising the standards for who they would accept, as a way of weeding out less desirable people, it was a buyer's market," John Pike, a military analyst, told me. "When the war came along they decided that a lot of these standards didn't have anything to do with war fighting."[36] It was a lie, as this book will reveal in its attempt to remedy the relentless propaganda.

CHAPTER ONE

The Other "Don't Ask, Don't Tell"

HITLER IN IRAQ

The military has a "don't ask, don't tell" policy pertaining to extremism. If individuals can perform satisfactorily, without making their extremist opinions overt . . . they are likely to be able to complete their contracts.

US Department of Defense report, 2005[1]

My journey into the dark underworld of the US military begins on a rainy Tuesday morning in March 2008, with a visit to Tampa, Florida, on the south-eastern tip of the country. The mission is simple: to meet Forrest Fogarty, a diehard American patriot who has served the US Army proudly for two years in Iraq, the central focus of America's War on Terror and the country's most controversial foreign adventure since Vietnam. The twist is that Forrest doubles as a white supremacist of the serious Hitler-worshipping type. Over the preceding months, I'd been speaking to him intermittently on his cell phone after his brother had put us in contact. It was a necessarily convoluted route: getting inside the neo-Nazi network in the United States is no cakewalk, requiring endless appeals via phone and email to penetrate the thick walls put up against a hostile mainstream media. I'd been uniquely successful with Fogarty, who is an effortlessly loquacious character with a compelling story, so I take a flight from New York City to meet him.

On arrival, I quickly check into the nearest hotel after the bus drops me off downtown, but it's early afternoon so I walk along the deserted walkway next to the Hillsborough River that runs through the heart of the city, dividing the University of Tampa from the skyscrapers on my side. It is about 5 p.m. before I eventually muster the courage to call Forrest on his cell. He picks up after a few rings. "Oh hey, I didn't think you'd come!" he says in his croaky voice, sounding happy to hear from me. "I usually go get a beer after work, why don't you come?" Sure, I tell him.

A couple of hours later I'm in a cab headed for his favorite hangout, the Winghouse Bar & Grill, which describes itself as "a casual sports-bar with delicious over-sized entrees." I'd assumed the place was downtown, so it's an unpleasant surprise when the taxi speeds along endless miles of pitch-black highway with the full moon barely lighting up the dense forests and thickets whizzing by. The situation is prime for a bit of macabre daydreaming: will I be jumped by a group of his mates, maybe even end up decapitated in the woods? Before too long we pull up at the sparkling Winghouse, located on a plain at the side of the highway, its bright lights a welcome interruption to the surrounding blackness. It's an open-plan restaurant with a bar in the middle and a group of Tampa belles in low-cut tops taking orders. In our brief phone call I'd asked Forrest how I would recognize him. "Just look for the skinhead with the tattoos," he said, laughing. And sure enough, sitting straight to my right as I walk in is a youngish looking man, plastered in tattoos, with tightly cropped hair, wife-beater vest, and bulging biceps—a poster-boy skinhead, the archetypal American Nazi. "Good to meet you," I say, not bothering to get confirmation. "Hey Matt," he replies. "Sit down." He is bright and alert, his keen eyes darting around as he speaks. We order some chicken wings with buffalo sauce, and a pitcher of beer. "You're British, right," he says. "I remember seeing black guys with British accents in Iraq, shit was so crazy."

Forrest is obviously in his element in the Winghouse as he slouches in his chair, beer in one hand, chicken wing in the other. He doesn't take long to start in with his life story, which, for shock value, is admittedly hard to beat. He tells me he grew up in Los Angeles and moved to Tampa at fifteen with some serious psychological baggage. In high school in LA he was bullied by Mexican and African American children and was just fourteen when he decided he wanted to be a Nazi. By the time his family moved and he switched to Leto High in Tampa, he had found his identity: "I eventually got kicked out of Leto High, for being a racialist," he says, his voice quivering with anger still. "I was getting in a few fights. What they do in desegregation is bus blacks into the neighborhood. On the first day, a bunch of niggers, they said 'Are you in the KKK?' to me, and I said, 'Yeah,' and it was on. After this, I kept getting in fights, eventually they expelled me."

It's nerve-wracking sitting in a bar with Forrest as he vents openly against black people and Jews. He has no qualms about flaunting his Nazism and I look like his friend. "I get into fights myself twice a month because I'm a Nazi," he assures me, pouring a pint of beer and smiling. "I'm completely open about it." When black people come into the bar he emits a hiss of disapproval. "I just don't want to be around them," he tells me. "I don't want to look at them, I don't want them near me, I don't want to smell them. And people say, 'Oh people who are racialist you've never hung around black people' . . . bullshit, I've showered with them, I've lived with them, I don't like them . . . they're fucking savages, they're tribal motherfuckers, they are different to us, how they think, how they conduct themselves." Although he has two kids to look after, aged nine and thirteen, he has the mannerisms of an adolescent. He speaks a lot about "chasing pussy" and getting into fights, and bloviates about Jews and Arabs in between. I nod my head insincerely.

But there's more to Forrest than just bravado. As he downs our pitcher of Bud he becomes freer and talks about his other great passion in life: music. As a young man he was obsessed with Ian Stuart Donaldson, the legendary singer in the British band Skrewdriver, who is hero-worshipped in the neo-Nazi music scene with a fervor akin to a thirteen-year-old Goth's veneration of Marilyn Manson. This adulation was so strong that at sixteen Forrest had an image from one of Skrewdriver's album covers—a Viking carrying an axe, an icon among white nationalists—tattooed on his left forearm. Soon after he had a Celtic cross, an Irish symbol appropriated by neo-Nazis, emblazoned on his stomach. A few years later he started his own band, Attack, now one of the biggest Nazi bands in the US, playing all over the country to crowds of white power fans. But it was never his day job. "I was a landscaper when I left school," he says, leaning back in his chair. "I kind of fell into it, I was a kid back then. I didn't give a shit what I was doing, I was just drinking and fighting."

For the next eight years he drifted through jobs in construction and landscaping and began hanging out with the National Alliance, at the time one of the biggest neo-Nazi organizations in the US. He soon became a member. The group's founder was the late William Pierce, author of The Turner Diaries, a novel describing the violent overthrow of the American government, and which is believed to have inspired Timothy McVeigh to carry out the 1995 terrorist attack in Oklahoma.[2] The Alliance is one of the few durable fixtures in the American extremist firmament, where groups often start up and die within a hummingbird's lifetime. At the time of Forrest's involvement with them, they were arguably the most powerful far-right force in the US. It has called for "a long-term eugenics program involving at least the entire populations of Europe and America."

With his music and friends in place, Forrest turned his attention to his lackluster work. Construction was never what he had wanted to do. He had always seen himself as a fighter and warrior. So he resolved to do what two generations of Fogartys had done before him: join the military. "I wanted to serve my country," he says as he chews on the last remnants of chicken. "Every male part of my family has served in combat; my father was in Vietnam for two tours as part of the Marine Corps, and my grandfather was in World War Two, Korea and Vietnam."

Forrest would not be the first extremist to enter the armed forces. The neo-Nazi movement has had a long and tense relationship with the US military, documented for decades. Since its inception, the leaders of the white supremacist movement—which is as old as the country—have encouraged their members to enlist. They see it as a way for their followers to receive combat and weapons training, courtesy of the US government, and to bring what they learn home to then undertake a domestic race war. The concept of a racial "holy war," often called "Rahowa," is adhered to by a host of extremist groups—from the Nation of Islam to neo-Nazis—and advocates an apocalyptic eruption of all-against-all racial violence that pitches races against each other and into open conflict with the government. Not all far-right groups subscribe to this vision—some, like the Ku Klux Klan, claim to prefer a democratic approach. But a large portion see themselves as insurrectionary forces challenging the moral bankruptcy of a government that is unreformable. To that end, professional training in warfare is a must. The US military has long been aware of these groups' attempts at infiltration. Even so, the first military directive pertaining to "extremism" didn't appear until the Vietnam War and the target of the new guidelines wasn't racist extremists, but rather anti-war elements. The Department of Defense Directive Guidelines for Handling Dissent and Protest Activities Among Members of the Armed Forces was aimed at curbing the influence of dissidents within the military by prohibiting the publishing of "underground" newspapers, the formation of military unions, and other actions that could be used by anti-war protestors to further their agenda.[3]

The presence of white supremacists in the military first triggered concern in 1976. At Camp Pendleton in California, a group of black marines attacked white marines they mistakenly believed to be in the KKK. The resulting investigation uncovered a KKK chapter at the base and led to the jailing or transfer of sixteen Klansmen. But the Vietnam-era legislation was the extent of provisions until 1986, when reports again surfaced of army and Marine Corps members participating in Ku Klux Klan activities. This forced President Reagan's Secretary of Defense at the time, Caspar Weinberger, to issue a directive stipulating that "military personnel must reject participation in white supremacy, neo-Nazi, and other such groups which espouse or attempt to create overt discrimination."[4] The 1986 policy change was modified further in 1996 when language was added to the DOD Directive that specifically banned white supremacist and neo-Nazi groups. It explicitly "prohibited activities" by these groups in the military. This change came after the murder in 1995 of two African Americans by a neo-Nazi paratrooper stationed at Fort Bragg, North Carolina. The killings led to an investigation that ultimately revealed twenty-two soldiers at Fort Bragg with known extremist tendencies. Fogarty was recruited the year after.

As we finish up our drinks at the Winghouse, I ask if I can meet Forrest again while I'm in the city, which is for just another three days. "I'm working tomorrow, and with the kids on Saturday," he says. Thinking quickly, I suggest taking them all to the local zoo, the first attraction I can remember from my hotel tourist pack. "Yeah, why not," he says, and we set a date for Saturday afternoon.

A Narrative of Mistakes

Driving out from downtown Tampa, it takes twenty minutes to arrive at the fifty-six-acre Lowry Park Zoo, tucked away behind the tree-lined highway. The place is overrun with kids and their parents even as the inclement weather beats down rain and hail. Forrest turns up a bit late with his two kids and we set off around the enclosures. Before the rain gets too much we take in the seals, the tigers, and the camels. "Goddamn camels," says Forrest, looking peaked, "I hate them things." We talk candidly about his racism and violence in front of his kids, who are a smart pair, not yet set on the same political trajectory as their dad. "There's nothing they don't know. I just tell them it's OK to be white," says Forrest. "In school they teach about slavery and the Holocaust, they teach them about indiscriminately murdering Jews. I say there's two sides to every story, you're hearing from the people who won the war. I don't care if they have non-white friends, but they will become gang-bangers and not like you when they are older." The younger kid is “hardcore” according to Forrest, but his ex-wife doesn’t want him joining the military. The older one is obviously very intelligent, outlining the evolutionary reasons for various animal quirks to me effortlessly.

After a good period, the rain sends us all to seek refuge under an umbrella-covered table by a restaurant. While Forrest’s sons play by themselves, he delves deeper into how he joined the military in the first place, with his five-star neo-Nazi credentials. He knew back then that the tattoo he had riding up his forearm could be a problem when it came to enlistment. In a neo-Nazi underworld obsessed with secrecy, racist tattoos remain one of the biggest indicators of extremism for a recruiter, and in an effort to police the matter the US military requires recruits to explain any tattoos. An army manual published in 2000 notes, that “Extremist groups frequently use tattoos to show group association” and offers recruiters a list of specific images to look out for, among them “lightning bolts, skulls, Nazi swastikas, eagles, and Nordic warriors.”[5] It instructs recruiters that any would-be soldier who refuses to remove an offending tattoo should not be allowed to enlist. Fogarty’s are quite clearly the kind written about in the manual—a Nordic warrior and a Celtic cross. This didn’t hinder his application. “They just told me to write an explanation of each tattoo and I made up some stuff and that was that,” he says, chuckling. Maybe it’s not so surprising. According to the military itself, the education of recruiters about how to identify extremists fell by the wayside during the War on Terror. A 2005 report by the Defense Personnel Security Research Center (DPSRC), which is a DOD entity, concluded that recruiting personnel “were not aware of having received training on recognizing and responding to possible terrorists”—a designation that includes white supremacists— “who try to enlist.” It found, on the question of extremist tattoos, that recruiters lacked “completeness, accuracy, timeliness, and accessibility of intelligence for screening tattoos.”[6]

After hanging out with Forrest, I decided to test it out. I contacted a random pool of recruitment centers and found that the level of awareness was low to minimal. I spoke to five different stations around the country pretending to be a prospective soldier, with the caveat that I had a pair of “SS lightning bolts” tattooed on my arm. Despite being outlined in army regulations as a tattoo to look out for, none of the recruiters reacted negatively and, when pressed directly about the tattoo, not one of them said it would be an outright problem. The conversations began in the usual fashion: I told them I wanted to join the military, and covered up for my British accent by saying I was just married to an American. The recruiter at Houston station hadn't heard of SS bolts. "I don't know what they are; you'll have to come in. They might be OK, might not be OK," she said. At the Houston Willowbrook office I was told, "I don't know, will have to crack the regulation open." At Waldo in Kansas City the recruiter's response was again ambiguous. "I'm not saying it means you can't get in," he said.[7] No wonder Forrest found it so easy. Not long after, my suspicions were given further validation when I was flicking through a long 2009 Newsweek profile of army specialist Terry Holdbrooks, who converted to Islam after being positioned at Guantanamo Bay. Deep into the article, with breathless ambivalence, the journalist recalls being at Holdbrooks's Phoenix apartment when "he rolls up both sleeves to reveal wrist-to-shoulder tattoos." Holdbrooks goes on to describe the "ink work as a narrative of his mistakes and addictions." These "mistakes" include "religious symbols and Nazi SS bolts, track marks and, in large letters, the words BY DEMONS BE DRIVEN."[8] The journalist fails to raise the obvious question: How did someone with a tattoo of Nazi SS bolts get into the US military in the first place?

But even if the tattoos are missed for whatever reason, it's not the last chance the military has to rid itself of a neo-Nazi soldier. An Army Command Policy manual devotes more than one hundred pages to rooting them out. But no officer appeared to be reading it. It states the policy generally: "Participation in extremist organizations and activities by Army personnel is inconsistent with the responsibilities of military service."[9] Specifically, soldiers are prohibited from participating in such organizations through public demonstrations or rallies, attending meetings or activities, fundraising, recruitment or training, taking a visible leadership role or distributing literature. The options available to a commander should these rules be transgressed are involuntary separation, reclassification action or bar to reenlistment actions, or other action "deemed appropriate." None of that appeared to be of interest as the War on Terror raged.

Medals and Everything

Soon after Fogarty was approved, he was stationed in the Third Infantry Division based at Fort Stewart, Georgia, the largest army installation east of the Mississippi River. Once at the base, the army got a helping hand from an unlikely source who alerted them to the extremist in their midst. As we stroll on again around the zoo, Forrest recounts the story of how his ex-girlfriend and mother of his eldest child was livid when he joined the military and tried to scupper his plans when he was positioned in Georgia, away from the family. “She hated that I was in the military,” he says as he looks at his kids. Her anger became so acute that, according to Fogarty, she sent a dossier of pictures to his military command that showed him at white supremacist and neo-Nazi rallies, as well as performing his racist rock with Attack. “They hauled me before some sort of committee, and showed me the pictures and asked me what they were. I just denied it and said my girlfriend was a spiteful bitch, which is true.” Although he talks a lot about chasing all sorts of women, Forrest claims he doesn’t go for women who are like him, which might explain her exasperation. He is currently single but says, “I try to keep some chicks, but I don’t like skinhead girls, I don’t like girls with tattoos.”

The committee, he says, “knew what I was about, but they let it go because I’m a great soldier, and they knew that.” The investigation, Fogarty tells me, was headed by Command Sergeant Major Tommy Dunne, now retired. When I contact Dunne by phone, he initially denies knowing Fogarty, but when I try again some months later he acknowledges that he remembers the soldier. I ask if he recalls seeing Fogarty’s prominent racist tattoos. “I didn’t see any tattoos like that,” he says. At one point in our conversations, Fogarty claimed that Dunn had told him “The only reason I like you is you’re racist!” I ask Dunn about this. “I don’t remember saying anything like that,” he says. “He was just an average soldier.” “It’s funny,” says Fogarty when I tell him. “He gave me medals and everything.” Even Colonel Todd Wood, the highest authority at the military installation, doted on him, according to Fogarty. I ask him whether that was because of his fighting prowess. “Yes, exactly,” he says, “They didn’t want me to get out, they were taking me to dinner, taking me and my wife out.” A roadside bomb in Iraq killed Colonel Wood in October 2005.[10]

The brave efforts of Fogarty’s girlfriend having gone unheeded, Fogarty remained in the reserves, until finally, in 2004, he was sent where he had always wanted to go: Iraq. “I’m a fighter, I love combat, I wanted to be in the action,” he says. At the time, the Tampa local newspaper, the St. Petersburg Times, interviewed him at Fort Stewart. There was no mention of his Nazism. “We didn’t come over here to hang out at Fort Stewart,” Forrest told them.[11] Before he left for the Middle East, Forrest joined the Hammerskin Nation—described by the Anti-Defamation League as the "the most violent and best-organized neo-Nazi skinhead group in the United States."[12] He was a probate for the Hammerskin Nation while in Iraq, a process that guards against infiltration, and on his return to the United States became a full-fledged member.

The degree of impunity encountered by Forrest and countless other extremists caused tensions within the military. The blind eye turned by the recruiters angered many investigators whose integrity was being compromised. Hunter Glass was a paratrooper in the 1980s and became a gang cop in 1999 in Fairville, North Carolina, next to Fort Bragg. "In the 1990s the military was hard on them, they could pick and choose," he recalls, "that was after the Burmeister trial, so they were looking for anybody, they were looking for swastikas, they were looking for anything." (James Burmeister was the army paratrooper convicted of murdering two African Americans in a 1995 racist gun attack in Fayetteville, while he was stationed at Fort Bragg.) But the regulations on racist extremists and fear of other Burmeisters did not continue with the inception of the War on Terror. "The key rule nowadays is ignore it until it becomes a problem," Glass tells me. "We need manpower, so as long as the man isn't acting out, let's blow it off." He recounts one episode in early 2005 when he was requested by the military police investigators at Fort Bragg to interview a soldier with blatant skinhead insignia—SS lightning bolts and hammers. "He was already in with this tattoo!" Glass exclaims. "I asked him about it, and he said he had dreamed it up. I asked, 'Where are you from?' He said Birmingham, Alabama." But Glass knew what it really was. "He had a hammer above it; he was a Hammerskin." Even so, the soldier claimed "it was because he was in an engineer unit." Glass worked with the base's military police investigators, who filed a report. "They recommended that he be kicked out," he recalls, "but the commanding officers didn't do anything." He says there was an open culture of impunity. "We're seeing guys with tattoos all the time . . . As far as hunting them down, I don't see it. I'm seeing the opposite, where if a white supremacist has committed a crime, the military stance will be, 'He didn't commit a race-related crime.' " Former Department of Defense investigator Scott Barfield had a similar experience: "Recruiters are knowingly allowing neo-Nazis and white supremacists to join the armed forces, and commanders don't remove them from the military even after we positively identify them as extremists or gang members."

Speaking in 2006, he added, “Last year, for the first time, they didn’t make their recruiting goals. They don’t want to start making a big deal about neo-Nazis in the military, because then parents who are already worried about their kids signing up and dying in Iraq are going to be even more reluctant about their kids enlisting if they feel they’ll be exposed to gangs and white supremacists.”[13]

The War on Terror produced no official acknowledgment from Pentagon brass that regulations have been loosened on neo-Nazis. Individually, however, officials seem to accept that it has happened by stealth. One is Douglas Smith, the public affairs officer at the Recruitment Command who spoke openly to me about the policy on extremists: “We don’t exclude people from the army based on their thoughts,” he explained. “We exclude based on behavior. But a tattoo of an offensive nature, racial, sexual, or extremist, might be a reason for them not to be in the military . . . The tattoo is a relatively subjective decision . . . We try to educate recruiters about extremist tattoos, but it’s going to depend on their general knowledge of tattoos.” He says that a racist tattoo shouldn’t automatically bar enlistment: “A tattoo in and of itself is not a bar to enlistment. It is behavior that would prohibit someone serving or enlisting. There are First Amendment rights . . . The concept seems to be if the tattoo is so patently offensive that it would cause disruption, it could require action.” Even a swastika might get through, he continues. “A swastika would trigger questions, but again if the gentleman said, ‘I like the way the swastika looked,’ and had a clean criminal record, it’s possible we would allow that person in.”

It’s in the interest of recruiters to interpret recruiting standards loosely, as failure to meet their targets means they have to attend a punitive counseling session, and persistent failure hurts their chances for promotion. When, in 2006, the army relaxed the regulations on non-extremist tattoos, such as body art covering the hands, neck, and face, this cut recruiters even more slack.[14]

Letting Everybody In

Leaders in the neo-Nazi movement agree that Forrest’s journey has become even more common as the military needs more fighters. One of those leaders is Tom Metzger, the seventy-year-old godfather of contemporary national socialism in the United States. “Ah, Metzger!” says Forrest, when I mention him at the zoo. “I know him pretty well, hung out a couple of times.” On the phone Metzger is quick to crack a joke, talk about his idiosyncratic political philosophy, and work out how he can help me with anything I want to know. Metzger's journey around the white supremacist movements started in the 1970s with the Ku Klux Klan, for whom he served as Grand Dragon in California. He twice ran for the Senate as a Democrat, against the party's wishes, and, when that failed, set up his own organization: White Aryan Resistance, or WAR. He has been in prison, declared bankrupt, and the subject of a BBC documentary. "Now they are letting everybody in," he says of the US military. "All the gang-bangers, all the blacks, Mexicans, and white supremacists. I would say that 10 percent of the army and Marines—they are not in the navy and air force so much—are racist extremists of some variety."

Metzger's organization is not your typical white power outfit. "I run an association of independent people who work in cells to the best of their talents," he says. "I would encourage them to join the military, if they have a scratch they can't seem to itch. Then go in to bring some training back to the US to make the federal government aware of our existence." Metzger's philosophy is a strange mish-mash of the far left, far right, and, in fact, everything in between. When he starts dilating it sends the unsuspecting listener into an ideological daze. One minute he's praising left-wing intellectual Noam Chomsky—"we disagree radically on race but his opinions on transnational corporations and how we are destroying the environment are spot on"—while the next he's on to Adolf Hitler. "I used to call it White Aryan Resistance. Now I call it The Insurgents," he says. "We are now a non-violent insurgency, but we are prepared to turn violent if the need be. It's up to the government. There are moves to suppress free speech and it won't be too long before they get their hands slapped . . . I'm no military general, I meet military people; there are no plans, just an insurgency that could become hot I would say by any means. Like any unconventional warfare it would involve whatever we would be capable of using. The white working class don't have jet planes and atomic bombs, we would work along other lines."

One veteran neo-Nazi who agrees is Billy Roper, who left the National Alliance after a power struggle in 2002 to start his own outfit, White Revolution. While in Tampa meeting Forrest I decide to call Roper. "We have some members in the military," he tells me. "There are a few in the 101st Airborne, some at Fort Campbell, and some Marines in Iraq . . .

There's about twelve in there, some of them have tattoos, because anyone can walk in and get in the military now." Roper tells me he knew two members who had swastikas and were barred but had them re-tattooed into sun wheels and the military allowed them back in. One group who don't shy away from swastikas is the NSM, or National Socialist Movement. It claims to be the biggest Nazi organization in the US but activists like Forrest and Roper call them "clowns" because of their propensity to dress up in World War Two fatigues. Someone calling himself Willem Herring, their spokesman, says he doesn't believe swastikas are a problem at all. "I do believe you can join the service with tattoos," he says. "I'm sure you can join with a swastika. There's a big gang problem in the armed forces right now: if you went to a recruitment station with a swastika I don't think they would stop you; it would be noted in your record."

The NSM is undoubtedly the most media-savvy group, in terms of their showiness and their accessibility. Through their media spokesman I am put in contact with Mark Connelly, the head of the SS division in New York, who I'm told is a college student and a "genius." I'm not given a number but rather told I will be called. "You limey bastard" is the first I hear from Mark. He suspects me of being part of the Jewish Defense Force, a radical Jewish organization. I call up the spokesman who pledges to sort it out for me. A few weeks after I get another call from Mark and this time he is less truculent. "Sorry about that," he says. "We just had a problem with the JDF; they were trying to mess us up." I assure Mark that I just want to find out what's going on with the NSM, and he seems to have the arrogance of youth, so I play to that. "I do the job pro bono," he says of his role. "It's something that you have to have a love for, it's hard, it takes character for people who want to learn about history. This is about the reality of World War Two and the demonized German society, and being in support of National Socialism." What brought him in? "I got into the movement when in high school, when I was learning things about certain events. They only tell you the victors' side of the war; I found many discrepancies. I used to be Republican, but it comes to the point where you can't trust the system."

Connelly won't give his age but by the sound of his voice he's young. He lives in upstate New York, near the capital, Albany. "I've been disowned by my mother," he says. The NSM are the most explicit Nazis in the US. They unashamedly worship Hitler, and dress up in 1940s Nazi regalia at their events. I attended their "historic" march on Congress in April 2008, billed as the biggest in decades. As the hundreds of cops and large numbers of anti-fascist protesters lined the streets before the march there was a feeling of great foreboding—until the NSM contingent arrived in a beat-up old van, containing perhaps thirty people, all waving swastikas, and dressed in jackboots. Scary it wasn't. Metzger calls them, without irony, "right-wing reactionaries": "They try to get in to the military covered in tattoos; my kind of people are taught to keep their mouth shut, to pretend they are race-mixing liberals; they don't join any racial organization," he says. "They are all nerds to me," adds Forrest. "I fit in more with the Hammerskin agenda: they are more political, we are more for street activism. We're skinheads, we're not politicians, we're street soldiers."

Away from the NSM's ostentatious pageants are the genuinely dangerous underground operators. One such is Dennis Mahon, who has been on the extremist scene for decades and had links with the Oklahoma bomber, Timothy McVeigh, although he remains coy with me as to what they were. "It drives you crazy," he once said. "Thousands think I was involved. I've started to believe it myself. Maybe I was there. Maybe they brainwashed me and I forgot about it. Maybe I can get hypnotized and remember it. Everybody said I was there. Everybody said I drove the truck. They saw me."[15] Tom Metzger, an old friend of Mahon's, puts me in contact with him, and when I get hold of him he picks up the phone panting like someone who has been doing strenuous exercise. He's at home and it's 2 p.m. "Now's not a good time," he says. "What are you doing?" I ask. "Oh, I really can't say," he replies. When I finally get him for the interview he talks about how he started out in the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan before joining the National Alliance in 1980. "I thought they were too conservative," he says initially. "I read a lot of books, like the Turner diaries, but then I was in Miami when we had the Haitian invasion." Mahon is alluding to the "Mariel boatlift," which saw an influx of asylum seekers during a seven-month period in 1980 when approximately 125,000 Cubans and 25,000 Haitians arrived by boat to South Florida. At the time Mahon was in the National Guard and was drafted in to help out. "I had to take them from federal prison; they were defecating and urinating in the back of the bus." His ideas started to change. "I thought the National Alliance wasn't radical enough, I went back to join the KKK in Columbia, Alabama." Now, Mahon acts as a "lone warrior," much like Metzger, not bogged down by the politics of petty rivalries which distract from his central mission: causing carnage in his race war against the government. “I guarantee something will happen—we’ve all got our targets. The Weathermen is a book about how to destroy America. The Achilles’ heel is the grid system: when energy is needed the most you blast the stations, and once the power goes out the cities go out. I know of a lot of vulnerable areas. I’m not going to say I’m going to do this, but there are some lone wolves. Chicago will be out for a week.”

Mahon received basic training while in the National Guard and, he says, put it to good use at the time. “I was in National Guard and I was doing some real serious shit,” he continues. “No one was ever the wiser—shootings and bombings.” He pauses. “No I can’t say, they can get you on civil rights violations, believe you me; the Klan can see what the results are, but you don’t see them.” He talks about a legendary “lone wolf” in Arizona, who goes by the code name Tom E. Gunn, a former Marine. “He does a lot of damage to people’s business and harasses people; he’s kind of nuts, I hear he’s a master of unconventional warfare, he does some damage to people and he was in the Marines. I’ve tried to talk to him,” he continues, “I talked to him one time, he is above ground; the underground guys, they are not supposed to contact me, but they send me newspaper clippings, there’s so many organizations getting busted.” Tom E. Gunn can be found attacking Tom Metzger— “Metzger, you are an old nobody, a has-been, and a never-was. Go away and nobody gets hurt. Show up with ANY of your kind and it will be your LAST mistake”—in a Phoenix New Times article about an Arizonian neo-Nazi icon named Elton Hall being hit by a vehicle while taking part in a protest,[16] but that’s about the extent of the evidence of his existence. Because he goes by an alias, tracking him down is near impossible.

Although joining the armed forces has been a frequently successful mission in the past, Mahon says now it’s even easier. “I know two people in the military—one in Marines and one in the army. One has done two tours of Iraq,” he says. “They are so desperate at the moment; they are going to let you in with a small swastika. If you are an obvious racist and shoot niggers and queers you might find it difficult, but generally you are fine. I’ve got reports from some of my sources in the military,” he continues. “They say they are getting a lot more skinhead types, quasi-racists, more tattoos; essentially they want guys that want to kill. In Iraq you don’t know who your enemies are, there’s no frontline.” But, he believes, this new liberalism will come back to haunt the authorities. “They are hard to stop,” he says.

“The soldiers learn from unconventional warfare in Iraq and they realize that they can use that type of warfare in America, and it’s impossible to stop. I tell people to learn as much as you can to improve munitions capabilities, patrolling; I want them to learn sniping and explosives, the Green Berets. Once they go in they are not supposed to tell anyone who they are.”

By the time this book hit the press, Mahon had been sentenced to forty years for a bomb attack that injured a black city official in Phoenix.

It’s Kill or Be Killed

Back in the zoo, Forrest plays around with his boys, throwing them about as the rain subsides and we once again start off around the enclosures. The zoo is divided into different themes: we hang out with the cats for a while, then we head over to the elephants under duress from the youngest. According to Mahon’s rhetoric the US will erupt in flames when soldiers like Forrest return from Iraq, but looking at him languidly walking around with his kids, talking about his girl troubles and boredom at work, I find it hard to imagine. He laughs a lot when I mention the grandstanding rhetoric of his fellow-thinkers. “Talking about race war right now, we’d be wiped off the planet!” he cries. Despite this, Forrest says a lot of his friends in the Hammerskins are under constant surveillance by the authorities. “All my friends have been to prison. The FBI paid $30,000 to infiltrate the ’skins . . . They learn that, guess what, we drink a lot of beer and chase pussy!” He continues, “I know my name has been brought up a lot of times by the FBI, they are out for my mates Cobi and Richie, they are trying to put something together, it’s totally crazy. They are on the Terrorist Watch List. The FBI contacted them, came to their house, the cops came to my house when I busted up the anti-war protest.”

As the afternoon wears on the animals start to blend into each other and the only thing that keeps sparking Forrest up is his time in Iraq. He returns again and again to the period he spent there from 2004 to 2005—it seems his most cherished life experience. For two years he served in the military police, escorting officers, including generals, around the hostile country. He says he was granted top-secret clearance and access to battle plans. “I was always on the move . . . Some of my actions led to the deaths of Arabs.” He shot at people but he can’t know how many he killed because he was always on the move: “If you stopped you’d get hit back. It’s a big rush,” he tells me. “It changes a human being. I never had any kill counts; some soldiers do.”

But there's no love lost for the local population. "To tell you the truth I hate Arabs more than anybody," he continues. "For the simple fact I've served over there and seen how they live. They're just a backward people . . . them and the Jews are just disgusting people as far as I'm concerned, their customs, everything to do with the Middle East is just repugnant to me." He wasn't happy with how the war was being fought either. "You have to break these people's will to fight; the only reason they are fighting is that there is some sort of profit to it, or it's not that bad, that the Americans are not going to do what they did in World War Two and kill everybody." Would he nuke Baghdad? "Fuck yeah! If we had an occupying force cracking down on spitting on sidewalks would you spit on the sidewalk if they shot you in the head for it? Go in with an ironfist: this is how you will live, if you don't we'll kill you. Quit pussy-footing around, listen to us or die."

Forrest maintains that a good portion of those around him were aware of his neo-Nazism. "They all knew in my unit," he says. "They would always kid around and say, 'Hey, you're that skinhead!'" Did anyone rat on him? "No, I was hardcore, I would volunteer for all the hardest missions, and they were like, 'Let Fogarty go,' you know what I mean, they didn't want to get rid of me." He was confident enough of his carte blanche from the military that during his break from service in 2004 he flew not to see his family in the US but to Dresden, Germany, to give a concert to 2,500 skinheads, on the army's budget. "What happens is you get to choose whether you want to go to Europe or America, and I put down Germany. The military didn't care. My friends picked me up from Frankfurt airport and I played two shows." What about getting caught? "Ah, fuck it," he sighs. When he was at Camp Victory in Baghdad, Forrest even says a sergeant came up to him and said plainly, "You're one of those racist motherfuckers, aren't you!" Fogarty's driver in Iraq was black and he rebutted, "Only I can call him racist!" I ask him how the sergeant knew about his racism. "The tattoo, I suppose. I can't hide everything—people knew—even the chain of command."

He starts getting really misty-eyed recollecting some of his close shaves in the warzone. "One time, I was pulling out of Camp Anaconda, which is about fifteen miles west of Baghdad. Some convoy had blocked lanes of traffic, so we had come out with a Humvee at 5 a.m. We were chilling, but there was this truck hauling at us and not stopping. I'm looking at my driver, he can't see, but my gunner is up there; he said, 'This guy's not stopping,' and I said, 'You know what to do,' and right when I said that, he was just hitting him up with a 50 cal, cha cha cha! Just shooting him up and it was coming towards at us and it was getting all blown to pieces, dude, and as we're pulling out it missed us by like two foot and just fell into the ditch . . . My gunner let him have it with a 50 cal; the gunner was a cool guy. Once you papped him up, I didn't get out the vehicle but I looked in, and there was nobody living."

Another time he was at Camp Victory North at Baghdad airport. "I was in the chow hall, a mortar round came in and blew up a bunch of guys, cut some chicks' legs off. Me and my gunner, I was drinking non-alcoholic beer for the 4th of July, we were like 'Welcome to Baghdad!'" On another occasion he came across the soldiers who had leaked the pictures of torture at Abu Ghraib. "Abu Ghraib was a torture center before the Americans, Saddam will cut your tongue out. Those guys' lives are ruined for harassing a bunch of dirty scumbags, I guarantee when an Iraqi captures us it's ten times worse," he says. "I met them in Camp Arifjan in Kuwait. We were in the chow hall, we were talking, I forget how it came up, one guy was like, 'I was pulled out of mission because I told someone about the pictures.' I said, 'You punk motherfucker' . . . pussy faggots, I cussed them out."

Although Fogarty gets excited talking about various operations in Iraq, he says he would never say anything "that would put the military in a bad light." In fact, he has so much antipathy for people who denigrate the military he was arrested by police for breaking up an anti-war protest in 2006. "They threw shit at my dad when he came back from Vietnam, I mean who are these left-wing scumbags?" he asks. "They tried to say I had PTSD [Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder] whenever I got arrested. The VA [Department of Veterans Affairs] said I had PTSD, but because I bust up the anti-war thing doesn't mean I'm suffering from PTSD." Despite all his pro-military rhetoric, Forrest is characteristically contradictory when he waxes lyrical about the hell of war. "You are trained to accept you are going to see dead people," he says. "War is not pretty, there's nothing good about war." He concedes, "The niggarabs are human beings."

After three hours trucking around we all resolve to head out of the zoo. We walk to the gate and I say goodbye. "I've got to get you the CD!" Forrest remembers. And before long he has run to his car and come back with his latest album, Survival. The jacket has a picture of him in military fatigues in Iraq. Back at the hotel I cast an eye over the lyrics, which are written in Gothic type on the inside sleeve. "Eye For An Eye" opens with the lines: A slow painful death I strive / Why are you still alive? The chorus goes: It's our turn to watch you bleed / It's our turn to tear you limb from limb . . . We will leave no survivors of this bloody war. Another one, "In Battle": In battle there are no laws . . . It's kill or be killed, die with the rest . . . Relief came when I pulled the trigger and watched you die / I can't stop laughing everytime I remember you start to cry / Watch you cry!

Kill a Couple of Towel Heads for Me OK!

Perhaps ironically considering their general warmongering, the American neo-Nazi movement was for the most part virulently against the war in Iraq. Most of the groups hold to an updated conspiracy theory about Jewish power, which they call ZOG, or Zionist Occupation Government. It is premised on Western governments' supposed submission to Jewish and Israeli power. On their internet forums, US soldiers are often greeted with incendiary comments about being "Jewish warriors" and "Zionist crusaders" for fighting in the War on Terror. This should not be surprising. The white supremacist movement across America has ebbed and flowed since the heyday of the Ku Klux Klan in the 1950s South. It is plagued by fissures and rivalries and ideological nitpicking that have always damaged its ability to form a large-scale and coherent movement. In 2008, there were over 150 different far-right groups—ranging from the Hitler worshippers to Christian nationalists—nestled all over the country. But as the War on Terror raged, extremism was increasing around America generally, according the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), a group that investigates hate and racist groups. In its report Rage on the Right it said that in 2008 extremist groups had come "roaring back to life," increasing by nearly 250 percent as well as building links to the mainstream right-wing.[17] It was a grave concern given their willingness to kill innocent Americans (as Timothy McVeigh had demonstrated), even more so now that they had military training.

Charles Wilson, spokesman for the National Socialist Movement, tells me the group is "150 percent against the war in Iraq. It was a total mistake to invade Iraq; we can't even secure our own borders. By 2015 white people will be a minority in America." The IKA, or Imperial Klans of America, is based on the original KKK. "I am, as many of us are, a vet," Truitt Lilly, the spokesman, writes in an email because he wants to remain faceless (and voiceless). "I do not encourage anyone to join any part of Z.O.G. However, military training is good training for anyone: tactics and physical and self defense and discipline are key to any Christian's way of life and should be taken into one's consideration." The original KKK is against it too. "We have opposed the war in Iraq since day one," national director Pastor Thomas Robb tells me. "If we are going to have a war then it needs to be done constitutionally."

But none of this anti-war sentiment has stopped them taking advantage of the opportunities for training. "We do encourage them to sign up for the military. We can use the training to secure the resistance to our government," says Wilson. "Every one of them takes a pact of secrecy . . . Our military doesn't agree with our political beliefs, they are not supposed to be in the military, but they're there, in ever greater numbers." He claims to have 190 members serving. Billy Roper, founder of White Revolution, is another advocate. "A number of skinheads have gone into armed forces for education, college, tuition, and the military training provided," he says. "They are using it to secure the future for white children. Anyone in the movement overseas knows they are getting training and financial help. America began in bloody revolution and it might end that way." Even Forrest, who talks with a glint in his eye about his time in Iraq, is actually against the war in essence. "I don't believe in the War on Terror," he says. "It's a war to protect Israel; I don't think we need to be over there, I just went. I get in this conversation a lot, but I don't like it when people call me a warrior for Israel."

Tom Leyden was in the movement for fifteen years before he managed to extricate himself in 1996. "I had to get out mostly because of my kids," he says on the phone. "I realized that the movement wasn't after me but my children. I was an organizer and recruiter, and I realized it wasn't me they wanted but my children, my boys would be the next generation and militants are much more hardcore than their predecessors." Forrest knows about Leyden and isn't impressed. "That guy is a punk—I'll eat him for lunch," he says. "He's milking the Jews—he had a couple of tattoos, said he was leader of the Hammerskins, there's no rank structure in the 'skins like he says. He has everything to gain by doing this—he has to stay employed, so he says, 'Skinheads are back!'" Leyden provides me with photographs of current servicemen with racist tattoos riding up their arms. "The military says maybe 1 percent is gang members," he says, "well, that's 14,000 people: they don't do training exercises that big! 90 percent of the gangs in the US are street gangs but 9 percent are white supremacists. That's 1,400 people are being trained by the armed forces who are extremist racists."

I stalk neo-Nazi forums for a period and they are still replete with bravado and machismo from people who claim to be soldiers serving in Iraq and Afghanistan who are shooting the locals not to further the military's strategic goals but because killing "hajjis" is their duty as white militants. The website New Saxon is a social networking website for "people of European descent."[18] One of the possible professions when making a profile is the military. There are currently forty-six members who claim to be serving. There is even a group—populated by six professed soldiers called "White Military Men"—started by a young man whose page is headlined with the phrase "FightingforWhites." "All men with military experience, retired or active/reserve should join this group to see how many men have experience to build an army. We want to win a war, we need soldiers," his profile reads. "FightingforWhites" is actually Lance Corporal Burton of the Second Battalion Fox Company Pit 2097, from Florida. In his About Me section, he writes: "Love to shoot my M16A2 service rifle effectively at the Hachies (Iraqis)," and among his passions is: "Love to watch things blow up (Hachies House)." His turn-offs include: "Overweight, lazy, illegals, WIGGERS, rape crimes, soldiers that died in Iraq, the Air Force (I called in an airstrike and they apparently had 'tea time' when it was called in)." On his wall his friend writes: "THANKS BROTHER!!!! kill a couple towel heads for me ok!"

There are other examples of the same ostentatious advertising of military credentials on neo-Nazi websites. On the forum of the website Blood and Honour, neo-Nazis encourage their serving comrades to commit indiscriminate murder, and allude to the training they are getting. "I am in the ARMY right now," writes 88Soldier88. "You have no idea how 'nice' we have to treat these fucking people. I work in the Detainee Holding Area so I see these fuckers every day (Terrorists) and we have to treat them better than our own troops. Its sick. I am in this until 2013. I am in the Infantry but want to go SF [Special Forces]. Hopefully the training will prepare me for what I hope is to come."[19] "I get out in 2009. I have the training I need and will pass it on to others when I get out," writes AMERICANARYAN. 88Soldier88 says he is leaving for Iraq in three days. "Aye bro stay safe!!" says AngryAryanHitman, "try get a few notches on ya rifflebutt from the filthy sand nigger cunts." "Good Luck Mate, Stay safe, Get a few Kills, and come Home," says "Paul." "Good luck and i hope everything goes well stay safe keep your head down and try to bag a few sand niggers," says 14 callum 88.

Via the website I wrote to a soldier, Jacob Berg, who claimed to be serving in Iraq. "There are actually alot more 'skinheads' 'nazis' White supremacists now then there has been in a very long time," he wrote back. "Us racists are actually getting into the millatary alot now because If we dont every one who already is will take pitty on killing sand niggers. yes I have killed women, yes I have killed children, and yes I have killed Older people. But the biggest reson Im so proud of my kills Is because by killing a brown many white people will live to see a new dawn."

In 2009, the whistle-blowing website Wikileaks released the internal emails of the NSM, including mine, and uncovered a number of military members conversing with the leadership back in the US. As the SPLC documents:

> Among those who contacted NSM was an infantryman who identified himself as Kyle R. Wrobel. Writing from a hotmail contact, Wrobel told NSM that he was from Cleveland, Ohio. "i am a sergeant in the US Army infantry, currently serving my second combat tour to iraq," he wrote on Jan. 17, 2008. "i vehemently support your cause, and want to become heavily involved. my wife and i both advocate and support the cause. i want a lifetime membership and want to become involved and do whatever i can as soon as possible."
>
> Wrobel served for four years in the Army and was discharged in November 2008 as a specialist, according to an Army spokesman. The type of discharge is not public information, the spokesman said, though an acquaintance of Wrobel said it was honorable. (It's unclear why Wrobel stated in his E-mail to the NSM that he was a sergeant, which is higher ranking than a specialist.) Wrobel received seven awards for his service, including the Combat Action Badge and the Iraq Campaign Medal for two year-long tours in Iraq, as well as the Army Good Conduct Medal.[20]

I had tried to get an interview with a NSM soldier (which was never forthcoming), but the Wikileaks release revealed the private correspondence between the group's members about my request which gives a shocking insight into how prevalent their members were in the military: "I did my part and forwarded his inquiry to NSM Colorado who is lead by Davi the guy who got the purple heart in Afghanistan," said Commander Jeff Schoep, the head of the organization and arguably the most powerful Nazi in America. "He . . . did not respond back. I know the Colorado guys are active and recruiting, just processed 2 or 3 new members from there. I cannot force them to talk to student reporters. Apparently they just don't want to do it. I agree with you, its an opportunity to reach people, but it seems most of our members will not talk with any Press. 88."[21] (In Nazi code, 88 symbolizes Heil Hitler, H being the eighth letter in alphabet.)

The more public internet bravado is hard to vet for truth, but there has been a real-life high-profile case of murder involving a soldier in Iraq who had SS bolts tattooed on his arm. The victim, Kevin Shields, was murdered on December 1, 2007, in Colorado Springs by three of his fellow soldiers, Louis Bressler, Kenneth Eastridge, and Bruce Bastien, Jr., who all served in Iraq as part of the Second Brigade Combat Team, Second Infantry Division in their early twenties. Bressler and Bastien were each put away for sixty years for their part in the murder alongside a litany of other crimes in Colorado Springs, while Eastridge is now serving a ten-year prison sentence for his part. But in the aftermath of the arrests, National Public Radio publicized the MySpace page of Eastridge.[22] It showed him proudly displaying his SS bolts tattoo. It also had a picture of him holding a cat in Iraq with the caption, "Killed another Iraqi pussy." There is a picture of a gun and a cache of ammo. "Ready for Whatever!!!!" says the caption. He has another tattoo that reads: "Killing is what I do." After his arrest, Bastien told investigators that he and Eastridge had randomly fired at civilians in Iraq during patrols through the streets of Baghdad. In broad daylight, Bastien alleged, Eastridge would use a stolen AK-47 to fire indiscriminately at Iraqi civilians. At least one was hit, he said.[23] "We were trigger happy. We'd open up on anything. They even didn't have to be armed. We were keeping scores," said another member of the platoon, José Barco, who is serving fifty-two years in jail for shooting and injuring a pregnant woman in Colorado Springs.[24] So far, no one has been charged with shooting civilians in Iraq.

The military not only ignored Eastridge's extremism, but on his return from combat awarded him a Purple Heart and Army Achievement medals. Eastridge's lawyer, Sheilagh McAteer, becomes palpably angry when I talk to her on the phone. She claimed that the military were now knowingly sending mentally unstable young men to Afghanistan and Iraq. "The military is to some extent desperate to get people to go to fight, soldiers who are not fit, mentally and physically sick, but they continue to send them," she told me. "Having a tattoo was the least of his concerns." Another white supremacist soldier, James Douglas Ross, a military intelligence officer stationed at Fort Bragg, was given a bad conduct discharge from the army when he was caught trying to mail a submachine gun from Iraq to his father's home in Spokane, Washington. Military police found a cache of white supremacist paraphernalia and several weapons hidden behind ceiling tiles in Ross's military quarters. After his discharge, a Spokane County deputy sheriff saw Ross passing out fliers for the neo-Nazi National Alliance.[25] On top of this, in early 2012, a photo emerged of a ten-strong US Marine Scout sniper unit posing for a photo with a Nazi SS bolts flag in Sangin, Afghanistan. According to the military, the symbolism was unknown to the soldiers. "Certainly, the use of the 'SS runes' is not acceptable and Scout Snipers have been addressed concerning this issue," Marine Corps spokesman Captain Gregory Wolf said.[26] But nothing about the SS bolts was unacceptable, and the claim that it could result in punishment was laughable. There were countless similar examples throughout the War on Terror that the military had known about—and brushed under the carpet.

Emerging Terrorists

The magnitude of the problem within the army and other branches of the military is, however, hard to quantify. The military does not track extremists as a discrete category, coupling them with gang members. People in the neo-Nazi movement claim different numbers. The National Socialist Movement claimed 190 of its members are inside. White Revolution claimed twelve. Tom Metzger claimed that 10 percent of those serving in the army and Marines are extremists of some sort. But the problem was conceded by the Department of Homeland Security in a 2009 report, Rightwing Extremism: Current Economic and Political Climate Fueling Resurgence in Radicalization and Recruitment, which noted that "the willingness of a small percentage of military personnel to join extremist groups during the 1990s because they were disgruntled, disillusioned, or suffering from the psychological effects of war is being replicated today."[27] On the back of the publication, DHS Secretary Janet Napolitano had to apologize to veterans' groups about her department's findings that "the return of military veterans facing significant challenges reintegrating into their communities could lead to the potential emergence of terrorist groups or lone wolf extremists capable of carrying out violent attacks." But the report was right. Following an investigation of white supremacist groups, a 2008 FBI report declared: "Military experience—ranging from failure at basic training to success in special operations forces—is found throughout the white supremacist extremist movement."[28] In white supremacist incidents from 2001 to 2008, the FBI identified 203 veterans. Most of them were associated with the National Alliance and the National Socialist Movement, which promote anti-Semitism and the overthrow of the US government, and assorted skinhead groups.

Because the FBI focused only on reported cases, its numbers don't include the many extremist soldiers who have managed to stay off the radar. But its report does pinpoint why the white supremacist movements seek to recruit veterans—they "may exploit their accesses to restricted areas and intelligence or apply specialized training in weapons, tactics, and organizational skills to benefit the extremist movement." In reality, white supremacists were using their military status to build the white right. The report found, for example, that two army privates in the Eighty-Second Airborne Division at Fort Bragg had attempted in 2007 to sell stolen property from the military—including ballistic vests, a combat helmet, and pain medications such as morphine—to an undercover FBI agent they believed was involved with the white supremacist movement (they were convicted and sentenced to six years in prison). It also found multiple examples of white supremacist recruitment among active military including a period in 2003 when six active-duty soldiers at Fort Riley were found to be members of the neo-Nazi group Aryan Nations, working to recruit their army colleagues and even serving as the Aryan Nations' point of contact for the State of Kansas.

It seemed everyone knew what was happening. A 2006 report by the National Gang Intelligence Center noted that "various white supremacist groups have been documented on military installations both domestically and internationally."[29] Neo-Nazis "stretch across all branches of service, they are linking up across the branches once they're inside, and they are hard-core," Department of Defense gang detective Scott Barfield told the SPLC. "We've got Aryan Nations graffiti in Baghdad," he added. "That's a problem."[30] Harold Cloverdell served in the army in Afghanistan for a year and in Iraq for two years. "You can go in any restaurant you can find graffiti, maybe a swastika," he says. "Or 'I hate hajjis'—what they call someone with Middle Eastern heritage . . . It pisses you off that you see it," he continues, "as it effects someone's performance, most guys are white in the infantry, a lot of them tend to be of European descent, it may have made someone else uncomfortable." Aaron Lukefahr is now a member of the Aryan Nations, but served two years as part of the Marine Corps in Okinawa in Japan. "I know of at least one other racialist," he tells me. "Once I saw some swastikas in our barracks, stationed in Japan, I don't know who that was, they never found out who it was, but there wasn't much investigation into it as an extremist act rather than an act of vandalism."

Despite the mounting evidence, the government itself did nothing, apart from to issue denials. The US Senate Committee on the Armed Forces has long been considered one of Congress's most powerful groups. It governs legislation affecting the Pentagon, defense budget, military strategies and operations. When I contacted the committee, it was led by the influential senators Carl Levin and John McCain. An investigation by the committee into how white supremacists permeate the military in plain violation of US law could result in substantive changes. Staffers on the committee would not agree to be interviewed. Instead, a spokesperson responded that white supremacy in the military has never arisen as a concern. In an email, the spokesperson said, "The Committee doesn't have any information that would indicate this is a particular problem." But in June 2011, the SPLC reported that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) had "virtually dismantled its unit responsible for investigating homegrown extremists." Daryl Johnson, an analyst who authored a 2009 DHS report warning of a "growing threat" from far-right radicals, told the group: "My greatest fear is that domestic extremists . . . will [carry] out a mass-casualty attack. That is what keeps me up at night."[31] Johnson's fears came closer to being realized in April 2012, when neo-Nazis started "heavily-armed" patrols around the area of Sanford, Florida—it was the natural conclusion of a decade of hard training by the US military, and a complement to similar work on the US–Mexico border. This new paramilitary garrison in Florida was organized by the National Socialist Movement—who, as we have seen, included a large number of veterans—in the aftermath of the shooting of black teenager Trayvon Martin. The Miami New Times reported that the group and their shock troops were "prepared" for race riots, and they would "defend" the white population. "Further racial violence . . . is brimming over like a powder keg ready to explode into the streets," said Jeff Schoep, the NSM Commander. "In Arizona the guys [in NSM] can walk around with assault weapons and that's totally legal," he added.[32] Schoep, however, refused to divulge what kind of "firepower" they had with them on the patrols of between ten and twenty American-style Waffen-SS. But with the military experience running through the movement, along with years of access to the highest-grade weaponry in the world, it can safely be assumed that it wasn't just 9mm handguns.

Begging

During the whole time I spend with him, the only time I see Forrest angry, aside from when his kids are messing around, is when he talks about he was treated after his tour of Iraq. He left in June 2006 and was later honorably discharged from the army before being asked to reenlist. "They were begging me to reenlist, they didn't want me to get out, my whole military career they didn't want me to get out," he says. He wanted to join Blackwater, become a private contractor and go back to Iraq. "You make a lot of money at Blackwater, $100,000 a year, I was getting $30,000 when I was in the army," he says. "They are hardcore, they're doing cool stuff, the army is fighting with boxing gloves on, Blackwater is gloves off." Unfortunately for Forrest the SPLC would intervene to stop his dream of going back to Iraq with immunity. In between honorable discharge from the civilian army and application for Blackwater, the SPLC had publicized his neo-Nazi connections.[33] After putting his application in to Blackwater, he was told that they "couldn't touch" him because he had been put on the Terrorist Watch List, kept by the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center in a bid to identify all potential terrorist threats to the US. "They defamed me," says Fogarty with real emotion. "It was slanderous, they painted me as a dumbass . . . I would have been able to stay in without the SPLC," adds Fogarty. "They [the army] wouldn't care unless I made an incident at work, but now the SPLC comes out it looks bad." Fogarty is right that he was unlucky. Despite his girlfriend's dossier, his tattoos, and his impromptu trip to Germany, he had been allowed to stay in, and would seemingly have been fine reenlisting had the SPLC not intervened. Following their report, the President of the SPLC, J. Richard Cohen, wrote a letter to the Under Secretary of Defense, David S. C. Chu, stating that "a combination of manpower shortages and poorly written inconsistently enforced regulations has resulted in the recent reappearance of significant numbers of extremists in the armed forces."[34]

John Fain is another. A soft-spoken and more thoughtful character, he spent two years fighting in the War on Terror, but has none of the bravado of other military extremists. He tells me he joined up "Not to learn combat, but to make myself a better person. I wanted a better work ethic, not just the training to be a soldier. It wasn't so much for a political thing when I joined the military . . . I'm concerned with the welfare and wellbeing of white Americans," he continues, "but the main thing with me is not so much how people look, but there's a particular interest that there is in the media, most of the people are Jewish, they'll admit it. It's not good when you have a population of three percent brainwashing the rest of the populace. People should be made free to have information, because the masses are stupid." His neo-Nazi affiliations did nothing to stop the military trying to reenlist him. Fain claims he has never been a member of the National Alliance, but considers himself a "patriot, which liberals in the military deem as extremist," and admits that he "support[s] the National Alliance" and "agrees with most of what they say." Erich Gliebe, the leader of the Alliance, seems surprised when I tell him Fain wasn't a member. "He isn't?" he asks. "I'm a separatist," says Fain. "I'd be willing to state it out in the street. I've worked with a black guy who had been member of the Black Panthers; he said, 'I don't have problem with white people but I don't want my daughter bringing home white men.' I feel the same, we're both racists. We had an understanding."

Fain joined the military in 1999 when he was eighteen years old, and since he had no tattoos or criminal convictions, he passed through recruitment easily. "I was kind of at a crossroads in my life, doing a dead end job," he says, in a familiar story. "I wanted to try to better myself, and I thought about joining the military. I was going to join the Navy but when I was there the army recruiter said, 'Can I talk to you in a sec?' " Within a week Fain had signed up. Between 2003 and 2004 Fain served two tours in Iraq, going all over the country, from Baghdad to Basra. "Most people keep their opinions to themselves," he says of fellow extremists. "But I've met quite a few of them actually. Last year I ran across a lot of people. I was sitting in the barracks in the US," he says. "There were some guys I overheard on their laptop and they were playing music from Resistance Records [a neo-Nazi music label]. I never noticed people causing a ruckus; the unit I was with was what would be considered good ol' boys from the country." Fain is actually relatively pro-Arab, for good racist reasons. "It's more what's in someone's head than color of their skin. Arabs aren't European, but they are governing themselves. They are not coming over to mingle with us. And they are against Zionist control of governments; they just want to have their own country and own lands."

When Fain returned from Iraq in 2004 he started to work for Vanguard Books, the literary arm of the National Alliance. It sells US army books: $9.95 will get you a tome on Explosives and Demolitions. And when Fain left the army, this spell working for the National Alliance came back to haunt him. The army refused him security clearance, which is a privilege conferred on soldiers and other civil servants after service that gives them access to classified information of a certain sensitivity. "They had found out information about me," says Fain. "I had worked for National Vanguard books, and they were like, 'Who owns it?' and I said, 'It's owned by a corporation.' So they said, 'Isn't it owned by the National Alliance?' I said, 'I don't know,' 'Are you member?' 'No, I don't hold membership but I work for them.' " The army had procured information on his employment through tax returns, and pursued their investigations of Vanguard Books. Despite this, Fain claims he was asked to reenlist. "I'm not going to do it, I've had enough now," he says. Does he think they relaxed standards? I ask him. "It's quite possible. I can't say that it is, I don't know what the government has issued, but I would say it's quite possible. Before they could be picky, now that they need to keep troop numbers high they are accepting no high school diploma, which is more detrimental. I'd rather see swastika than an idiot with no tattoos." Elsewhere the SPLC quotes Fain as saying, "Join only for the training, and to better defend yourself, our people, and our culture. We must have people to open doors from the inside when the time comes."[35]

The discharge figures confirm the experiences of Fogarty and Fain. They show that the avenues the army guidelines stipulate for dealing with extremists already serving in the military have been drastically reduced since 1998, and increasingly so since the War on Terror was initially announced. One such avenue is the denial of reenlistment, which fell from a high of 4,000 soldiers rejected in 1994 to a low of 81 in 2006. Another is a soldier receiving misconduct charges resulting in discharge from the army. In the five-year period from 1998 to 2003 the number of discharges for misconduct teetered from a high of 2,560 to a low of 2,307. But by 2006 this number had fallen off to 1,435.[36] Again, misconduct is a broad category but the decline shows clearly that standards dropped.

The US Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID) is set up to investigate criminal behavior by army personnel and their reports have often touched on the problem of extremist soldiers. A number of internal investigations into extremist soldiers I obtained through the Freedom of Information Act show that CID consistently ignored evidence of violent neo-Nazis and white supremacists. One case at Fort Hood included evidence that a soldier was making internet postings on the white supremacist site Stormfront.org. But the investigator seems to have been unable even to locate the soldier in question. Due to "poor documentation," he writes, "attempts to locate with minimal information met with negative results . . . I'm not doing my job here," he notes. "Needs to get fixed."[37] Another investigation into another soldier at Fort Hood is even more distressing. The investigators found that he belonged to the neo-Nazi Hammerskins and was "closely associated with" the Celtic Knights of Austin, Texas, another extremist organization, a situation bad enough to merit a joint investigation by the FBI and CID. The army summary states that there was "probable cause" to believe that the soldier had participated in at least one white extremist meeting and that he had "provided a military technical manual [Improvised Munitions Handbook] to the leader of a white extremist group in order to assist in the planning and execution of future attacks on various targets." Of four preliminary probes into white supremacists I obtained, CID carried through on only this one. On March 22, 2006, the suspect provided the Improvised Munitions Handbook to the leader of the Celtic Knights, it notes, "to assist in the planning and execution of attacks on five methamphetamine laboratories in the Austin, TX area." It adds, "these attacks were not carried out and the [Joint Terrorism Taskforce] indicated a larger single attack was planned for the San Antonio, Texas after a considerable amount of media attention was given to illegal immigrants. The attack was not completed due to the inability of the organization to obtain explosives." The document notes that despite these grave threats the subject was only interviewed once, in 2006, and the investigation was terminated the following year because the action commander or prosecutor indicated intent to do nothing or at least only "action amounting to less than a court proceeding." The report added, "no further investigative assistance of CID is required."

Another internal report documented the case of an Army National Guard member who investigators believed was "the leader and recruiter" for the Alaska Front, yet another white supremacist organization. The summary describes the soldier as "a person of interest to the FBI due to statements made by the Soldier relating to the robbery of armored cars." The soldier and another member of the Alaska Front were, the report notes, employed by the security company in Anchorage responsible for transporting money using armored cars. Once again, after noting clear affiliations and concrete threats of criminal activity, the narrative indicates that the investigation was closed. "The Soldier's Commander was briefed," it reads. "No further investigation has occurred by the FBI since the Soldier has been mobilized to Camp Shelby, MS in preparation for deployment to Iraq."[38]

The 2005 DPSRC report found that because recruiters and basic training officers lack clear instructions on how to handle evidence of extremist affiliations and also fail to share information, "military personnel cannot evaluate the full extent to which problematic persons associated with particular groups are trying to enlist in the military and their apparent strategies for doing so." It concludes, "Personnel are unlikely to be able to detect anything beyond what would appear to be isolated incidents." Finding evidence of participation on white supremacist websites would be another easy way to screen out extremist recruits, but the same report found that the DOD had not adequately clarified which web forums were gathering places for extremists. In fact, even in cases where active-duty soldiers have been caught posting to such sites, the investigations have been terminated. It appears to some insiders that this incoherence and confusion is consciously fostered to allow the recruitment of extremist soldiers to continue, and to avoid their discharge. "Effectively," the report concludes, "the military has a 'don't ask, don't tell' policy pertaining to extremism. If individuals can perform satisfactorily, without making their extremist opinions overt . . . they are likely to be able to complete their contracts."[39] This went for Islamic fundamentalists, too. When Nidal Malik Hasan allegedly murdered thirteen of his fellow soldiers at Fort Hood in Texas, it was revealed afterwards that the military had been aware of his Islamic extremist ideology but had done nothing to stop it. Hasan had been in contact with his ideological hero Anwar al-Awlaki—the extremist cleric exiled in Yemen who was assassinated by the Obama administration in 2011—and the military had either not trained its personnel well enough or had told them to turn a blind eye to extremism.

Carter F. Smith, another former military gang investigator, defends CID, who he worked with in 2004–6, telling me, "They don't bend to the whims of the commander as much as people on the outside say. They piss a lot of people off. If they wanted to push something they could, but it takes a lot of emphasis on what's right." But he is not surprised by the lax 2006 CID "investigations." "When you need more soldiers you lower the standards whether you say so or not," says Smith, who served as military investigator from 1982, and from 1998 to 1999 was the chief of the gang-hate group investigations team. "The increase with gangs and extremists is an indicator of this." He says the pressure to maintain numbers might make an investigator "ignore stuff . . . Say an investigator sees a soldier with a tattoo that reads '88,'" he says, "if you know 88 is Heil Hitler, but the soldier gives you a plausible reason and you don't look for any memorabilia, you can let him go . . . It's not that they aren't concerned about white supremacists," he adds, "but they have a war to fight and they don't have any incentive to slow down."

Iraq as Race War

For neo-Nazis to prosper in the US military, a general culture of racism is undoubtedly a prerequisite. Forrest stood out because of his skinhead appearance and tattoos, but his casual use of the derogatory term "hajjis" and perception of Arabs as "backward" became endemic throughout the military during the War on Terror. "Racism was rampant," recalls veteran Michael Prysner, who served in Iraq in 2003 and 2004 as part of the 173rd Airborne Brigade. "All of command, everywhere, it was completely ingrained in the consciousness of every soldier. I've heard top generals refer to the Iraqi people as 'hajjis.' And it wasn't auto-ingrained in the soldiers, the anti-Arab racism came from the brass, it came from the top and was pushed into the mind of subordinate soldiers." Prysner believes this kind of racist attitude is consciously fostered to make the military operations easier to carry out. "Even before the invasion racist language was always used against the Iraqi people," he said. "Attributing their condition to cultural backwardness, painting a picture of backward people helped this idea that they needed the US to go in. When you are carrying out missions this is what was on the mind of the soldiers, so the soldiers conduct themselves terribly; we weren't acting with human beings to protect them, we were there to control every Iraqi who was subordinate to us, and everything was justified because they weren't considered people."

Another vet, Michael Totten, who served in Iraq with the 101st Airborne from 2003 to 2004, agrees: "I think at a fundamental level there's a type of superiority complex, a heightened sense of importance; the military carries this attitude, in my experience, towards the people of Iraq. The Iraqis were seen as substandard, second class, a lot of times they weren't seen as human, they were seen as an obstacle, more of a burden, I didn't feel that we were going in as liberators, I felt I was there for the sake of being there." On neo-Nazis like Fogarty, he doesn't think they would stand out at all. "It wouldn't stand out if you said 'sand-niggers,' even if you aren't a neo-Nazi. At the time, I used the words 'sand-nigger,' I didn't consider 'hajji' to be derogatory. I have changed since I came back, obviously." Even racism between soldiers was rife. In late 2011, eight soldiers were charged after the suicide of Chinese-American Private Danny Chen, a nineteen-year-old infantryman from New York, who shot himself in Kandahar, Afghanistan. The charges were brought against the soldiers for an alleged long history of assaults and racist taunts which led to him taking his life. Geoffrey Millard served in Iraq for thirteen months, beginning in 2004, as part of the Forty-Second Infantry Division. He recalls General George Casey, who served as the commander in Iraq from 2004 to 2007, addressing a briefing he attended in the summer of 2005 at Forward Operating Base, outside Tikrit. "As he walked past, he was talking about some incident that had just happened, and he was talking about how 'these stupid fucking hajjis couldn't figure shit out.' And I'm just like, Are you kidding me? This is General Casey, the highest-ranking guy in Iraq, referring to the Iraqi people as 'fucking hajjis.'" (A spokesperson for Casey, who later served as the Army Chief of Staff, said the general "did not make this statement.") "We had a frago [fragmentary order] come out one day that actually talked about how the DOD wanted us to stop using the word 'hajji' because it was seen as a racist slur, but I still heard [another general] use the word hajji. He'd have to correct himself, but it didn't change his thought pattern." Millard was later an organizer for Iraq Veterans Against the War and says he has seen white nationalist tattoos during outreach operations. "Since we've been doing outreach to bases there's this [White Power] tattoo that I've seen a couple of times, and a couple of other different racial symbols. They've got rid of the regulations on a lot of things, including white supremacists . . . The military is attractive to white supremacists," he adds, "because the war itself is racist."

Forrest never saw what the beef was—much like the military itself. "As long as you don't bring personal beliefs to the military it's not a problem," he tells me. "If I was goose-stepping maybe, but I served my country honorably. I'm a soldier who is trying to come home, I have got two children, I'm not gonna be preaching politics while my driver's a nigger." He pauses. "What about the Bloods and Crips?" he asks, exasperated, before we go our separate ways. What about them? I ask. "I seen a million Bloods and Crips," he says nonchalantly. The Bloods. The Crips. Two of the biggest and most dangerous gangs in the US or any other country on the planet. "I seen a million."

STRAIGHT OUTTA BAGHDAD

When these cats, these gang members, come back, we're going to have some hell on these streets.

Miguel Robinson, Airman First Class and Los Angeles Crip, 2007[40]

On the eve of America's most patriotic day in 2005 a group of US soldiers from the army base in Kaiserslautern, southwest Germany, took a drive down to the park pavilion in a nearby forest. The twelve soldiers in the group were in high spirits: aside from the July Fourth festivities coming the next day, some of them were due to finish their first eighteen-month tour of duty, including a spell in Iraq, within a matter of weeks and would be returning home to their long-suffering families. Among them was twenty-five-year-old Sergeant. Juwan Johnson, or J. Rock to his friends, a member of the Sixty-Sixth Transportation Company who was looking forward to returning home to his pregnant wife within the fortnight. It was to be a welcome relief; the past year had been a difficult one. During his tour of Iraq, he had seen the sharp end of the conflict, reportedly surviving an IED (improvised explosive device) attack which blew up his vehicle, and finding the toil of war difficult to cope with. But nothing would prepare him for the treatment he was about to receive from his comrades shortly after 9 p.m. that night. In the park pavilion, J. Rock was set to become a full-fledged member of the Chicago-based gang the Gangster Disciples, listed by the FBI as one of the fifteen biggest gangs in the US. The purpose of the trip that night was to conduct his initiation ceremony, a rite of passage he had to endure to realize his dream of becoming part of one of America's fiercest street gangs. In gang lingo the ceremony is called "jumping in," also known as a timed beating. Soon after they arrived, the pack of men Johnson had gone down with began to circle their new recruit. The leader of the gang at the base, Rico Williams, a former airman, struck the first blow, lamping Johnson straight across the face—a blow that knocked him unconscious. The ferocious beating that ensued soon "escalated from reckless to a free-for-all."[41] Johnson's lifeless body was treated to a six-minute orgy of violence in which he received 200 blows all over his body and head from the fists and feet of his fellow soldiers.

Still in an unconscious state, Johnson was placed back in his bed by his attackers. He would never wake up. The next morning one of Johnson's roommates found him in his barracks room but could not rouse him. After trying desperately to resuscitate him, a German physician was called who pronounced him dead on arrival. The resulting autopsy report, signed by an Army Forces regional medical examiner, concluded: "The cause of death of this twenty-five-year-old male is multiple blunt force injuries reportedly sustained in a physical assault resulting in fatal injury to the heart and brain." It added, "The manner of death, in my opinion, is homicide."[42] Despite the unambiguous verdict, more than three years later only three of the eleven suspects had been convicted and given confinement terms.[43] One reason for this abysmal bit of police work may have been the intense fear running through the veins of the suspects which had stopped them speaking out. At a Gangster Disciples barbeque in the aftermath of the murder, the gang's ringleader Williams had warned the rest of them that he would kill anyone who snitched to the authorities, along with their families. The more likely reason for the failure to bring Johnson's killers to justice, however, was reluctance on the part of the military to prosecute the case as it tried to keep a lid on public recognition of the developing crisis arising from the gangs' infiltration of the military.

In the end, it took until February 2009 for the police to arrest the main suspect Williams in his hometown of Chesapeake, Virginia, and charge him with second-degree murder as well as three counts of tampering with a witness, including intimidation and threats.[44] The military decided to try him through a court-martial—a legal process much more secretive and less independent than civilian trials. He was found guilty of second-degree murder in November 2010, nearly six years after Johnson was slain, and was acquitted of tampering with a witness.[45] If the military's goal was to keep the embarrassing press to a minimum, it was a success. In another trial by court-martial, suspect Private Bobby Morrissette was acquitted in Germany on charges of voluntary manslaughter and conspiracy to commit aggravated assault, which carried a possible fifty-five years confinement.[46] It was a stunning verdict—Morrissette had been found to have taken part in the "jumping in" that had led to Johnson's death. He was instead found guilty of impeding the investigation and the trial, and willfully disobeying a superior commissioned officer. In a separate incident, giving a further indication of his questionable moral fiber, he was convicted of committing an indecent act on a female in the presence of another person and wrongful use of a controlled substance. In the end, he got away with forty-two months confinement and a bad misconduct charge.

Understandably the acquittal and weak sentencing angered Johnson's grieving mother, Stephanie D. Cockrell. "I'm angry, and I'm outraged that we have gangs in the military," she said. "The court system is sending a message that it's OK."[47] Her complaint would be vindicated not long after when another soldier involved in the beating, senior airman Jerome A. Jones, was also acquitted of involuntary manslaughter in another court-martial, despite being present at the beating. After denying all charges, Jones was given the lesser conviction of aggravated assault, as well as being found guilty of marijuana use and assisting in hiding gang members and conspiracy to cover up the murder—including tampering with their gang tattoos.[48] He was given a dishonorable discharge and sentenced to two years in prison by the five-member panel which comprised two air force officers and three air force non-commissioned officers from the Little Rock base—where Jones was stationed. In the subsequent months, the military cover-up became even more scandalous as it emerged that the authorities had actively suppressed intelligence from a whistle-blower on the growing threat of gangs in the Sixty-Sixth Transportation company. In the period before the murder, another soldier in the company, Private Nick Pasquale, had taken copious pictures of gang graffiti in Iraq and on the base and handed them to his superiors in an attempt to press them into action. It had resulted in an investigation into the unit over the course of its thirteen-month deployment to Iraq, which turned up ironclad evidence of gang activity. According to the military newspaper Stars and Stripes, "the probe involved soldiers believed to be members of the Chicago-based Gangster Disciples. Numerous photos of Disciples had been found, along with graffiti and a list of potential gang members, in the soldiers' living quarters."[49] But the investigation reported to have found no evidence "validating or disproving" the rampant gang activity in the unit.

Just two months later Johnson was dead. “The only thing that came from the investigation downrange was that I was a disgruntled soldier, causing problems,” Pasquale said. He had even written down the names of those he suspected of gang activity and given them to his superiors, who refused to take action. “Then we come back from Iraq and wham, bam a soldier’s dead. I want [Johnson’s] family to know that your son, your husband, the father of your child did not have to die. I want his family to know that he didn’t have to die if someone had done their job and not swept this under the rug,” said Pasquale. In the aftermath of his testimony, Pasquale was the target of relentless abuse and intimidation, including threats to his life and gang graffiti daubed on his barracks. He even had alarms fitted and slept with knives. “If I do get killed, I don’t want to be another Sgt. Johnson with people wondering, ‘What happened to him? Why?’” he said. “I don’t want my mother going through what Sgt. Johnson’s mother’s going through, trying to get answers from the army.”

Getting Answers

That Pasquale didn’t want his mother asking the military for answers is understandable. Throughout the War on Terror, getting genuine answers from the army or any other branch of the military about gang infiltration was impossible. The reaction from the military brass when presented with evidence of the vast numbers of gang members in their midst—even from federal investigators or their own troops—oscillated from outright denial to ad hominem attacks on those making the charges. The threat to the wellbeing of troops, the occupied populations and those back home in American cities didn’t seem to trouble them. The most serious and important work undertaken to collect information had, therefore, to be undertaken outside of the military establishment—primarily, by the FBI and civilian police. An extensive report on the problem was published by the FBI in 2007, but at the time it barely registered on the radar of the mainstream media and became another important military-related document read only by the initiated.[50] This time around, however, it was more surprising than usual as the findings were particularly worrying for the domestic population of the US. Gang-bangers know a lot about fighting and violence—it’s their raison d’être. But until the War on Terror that “expertise” had never been shifted wholesale from the inner city to the US military, from South Central to Baghdad and back again. “Gang-related activity in the US military is increasing and poses a threat to law enforcement officials and national security," the investigators concluded. "Members of nearly every major street gang have been identified on both domestic and international military installations." The FBI did not mince words when outlining the problems this could cause for the military. Gang membership in the ranks will "result in disruption of command, low morale, disciplinary problems, and a broad range of criminal activity," as well as the "risk of transferring their weapons and combat training back to the community to employ against rival gangs and law enforcement officers."

Despite this prognosis, in its long history the US military had never instituted regulation prohibiting gang members from joining its ranks. It is true that gang members tend to have criminal records, which can bar an individual from enlistment, but if they are clean, there is sufficient ambiguity in regulations to allow them through. And even criminal records aren't always a bar. Another strange feature of the military's enlistment process is that it relies on recruits to voluntarily reveal their past records, rather than actively investigating them. If the recruit is upfront enough they will go through a "suitability review" which includes a police record check. If that record contains frequent offenses for a number of misdemeanors, the recruit will require a "moral waiver" in order to serve.[51] The FBI fingered this as a serious problem which had allowed gang members to fly through recruitment. "Gang members have been known to enlist in the military by failing to report past criminal convictions or by using fraudulent documents," said the report.[52] And once they are in, a whole new complex of problems appears. The FBI lamented the impossibility of gauging the extent of the gang members in service because "military authorities may not recognize gang affiliation or may be inclined not to report such incidences" (my emphasis). It's an incredible suggestion: the federal government's investigative branch cannot gauge the problem of criminal gangs in the country's fighting forces because the military refuses to report gang activity. This dereliction of duty could, the report said, "ultimately jeopardize the safety of other military members," as it did so tragically in the case of Johnson—and he was far from being the only one.

The unit of the military assigned to investigate criminal activity in the service, the CID, was an integral part of the cover-up, denying the existence of the problem from start to finish. "We recently conducted an Army-wide study, and we don't see a significant trend in this kind of activity, especially when you compare this with a million-man army," said its report into gang activity in the military, published at the same time as the FBI report.[53] CID's own report found that gang-related investigations went up from four to sixteen between 2003 and 2006, while incidents went up from eight to forty-four in the same period, in keeping with the enlargement of the force. But FBI gang investigator Jennifer Simon told Stars and Stripes that "it's no secret that gang members are prevalent in the armed forces, including internationally."[54] She said gang members had been documented on or near US military bases in Germany, Italy, Japan, South Korea, and Iraq. The discrepancy in the reporting of the problem caused huge tensions between the FBI and the military's investigative units, who seemed piqued that the federal authorities took their job so seriously. They were shocked that the FBI was failing to understand the manpower pressures the military was under. The resulting internecine war was bitter. On the back of the worrying FBI report, the military said the bureau was "overstating the problem, mixing historical and more recent events, and using unsupported hearsay type comments and statements from various undocumented experts."[55] In the aftermath a joint memorandum from the military investigative units was sent to the FBI "contesting parts of the assessment, asking for its withdrawal, and offering increased cooperation and coordination to obtain a more accurate estimate of the gang problem in the military." The FBI said no, and the military published its own report in riposte.

A military spokesman later asked about the problem entered the realm of fantasy: "In nearly every one of the cases that we looked into, it is a young man or woman who thought that the symbol looked cool," he said. "We have found some people even get gang tattoos not really knowing what they are, or at least that they have not had any gang affiliation in the past." It's a serious strain to believe that the significance of florid gang tattoos would be unknown to their owners: usually an indelible mark on the skin demands some research. But these dopey soldiers had company within the military in the form of recruiters, who seemed to know even less about what gang tattoos look like. It wasn't entirely their own fault: as the military investigators demonstrated so impeccably, commanders didn't see it as an issue and preferred to turn a blind eye in the face of pressure to maintain recruitment levels. On top of that, as the FBI pointed out, many "military recruiters are not properly trained to recognize gang affiliation and unknowingly recruit gang members, particularly if the applicant has no criminal record or visible tattoos."[56]

Hunter Glass, the gang investigator, adds: “If we weren’t in the middle of fighting a war, yes, I think the military would have a lot more control over this issue, but with a war going on, I think it’s very difficult to do.” The military was also experiencing an intense financial squeeze from the Bush administration, which was impacting its ability to control the problem. “Forming multi-agency task forces and joint community groups is an effective way to combat the problem,” says the FBI report. “However, decreases in funding and staffing to many task forces have created new challenges for civilian communities.”[57] Recruiter conduct deteriorated at the same time. In a single year, from 2004 to 2005, the number of military recruiter violations increased by 50 percent as recruiters tried increasingly aggressive tactics and unscrupulously doctored documents. In the same period, the local CBS station in Denver, KCNC, did an important investigation into recruiter conduct when faced with a prospective soldier who claimed to be a gang member. The station’s reporter asked his interlocutor in the recruitment center: “Does it matter that I was in a gang or anything?” to which the recruiter responded, “You may have had some gang activity in your past and everything . . . OK . . . but that in itself does not disqualify.”[58] There were also numerous reports of recruiters trying to cover up the previous affiliations of gang-members-turned-soldiers. In 2005 a Latin Kings gang member was allegedly recruited into the army at a Brooklyn, New York, courthouse, while awaiting trial for assaulting a police officer. He was reportedly told to conceal his gang affiliation. The effects were perhaps predictable. Jennifer Simon, the FBI gang detective, added: “It’s often in the military’s best interest to keep these incidents quiet, given low recruitment numbers and recent negative publicity. The relaxation of recruiting standards, recruiter misconduct and the military’s lack of enforcement have compounded the problem and allowed gang member presence in the military to proliferate.”[59]

In this period, according to reports from soldiers and investigators, Baghdad had become a veritable canvas on which gang members sprayed their markings after the invasion. The Gangster Disciples, as well other heavyweights like Latin Kings and Vice Lords—groups fostered in the badlands of Chicago—had left their mark on armored vehicles, walls, barricades, and bathrooms. An Army Reserve sergeant, Jeffrey Stoleson, seeing this all around him and growing increasingly angry about it, decided to go out on a limb in an effort to alert the American public. Stoleson was deployed twice—first in Kuwait and Iraq in 2005–6, and then later again in Iraq—but he stayed away from a face-to-face confrontation with the gangs. "We all carried loaded weapons at all times and with these hot heads you never know who they may be trying to prove something to," he tells me. He adds that there were two types of gang members: some genuinely wanted to escape from the 'hood and the lifestyle and without the military had no chance. But the majority were training themselves for the war back at home. He says they were "using the methods taught in combat to take home and use against others who have no chance in hell of defending themselves." They weren't trying to hide it either, many posting up graffiti all over Iraq. "It was all over the place, the graffiti was blatant; they were not trying to hide the colors or gang affiliations or even tattoos. Most of the bases had gang graffiti on them from Kuwait to the border with Turkey. It was on Baghdad International Airport, the blast walls. It was a Who's Who of American street gangs, everything was there." Stoleson tried hard to get pictures of the graffiti, but when his senior officer realized he was intent on publicizing the problem "he made sure I was busy and not able to get them." Before he got to the airport to take the snaps they painted over the graffiti. "I mean it was covered with graffiti close to one mile long, twenty feet high." "Some was 'Hi Mom' and derogatory terms for other soldiers but most of it was gangs," he added. Stoleson was also hearing from his colleagues that graffiti was being sprayed on the streets of Baghdad by US troops from different bases to denote their domains of influence. "It was like their turf, you didn't go there after certain times of the day," he says. "Many feared for their safety." Some troops would even wear their gang colors in their military fatigues by coloring the inside pocket of their fatigues red or blue and when they passed each other they would pull them out to show allegiance.

As an upstanding soldier, Stoleson thought that if he raised this with his superiors they would take action or at least investigate. He was wrong. "I brought it up a couple times, but I was told to leave it alone, that they [gang members] were doing a good job et cetera," he says, adding, "but for who and what flag? Not the red, white and blue." Things got more serious when Stoleson started seeing military gear begin to go missing—mainly parts for weapons systems, mounts, optics, and small things that were easy to hide or ship. The command still weren't interested. "At first they blew it off and said to leave it alone, it's not your job," he says. But Stoleson had taken an oath to protect his country from terrorists domestic and foreign, so he went to the press. “When the CID got a hold of me after the story got out in the Chicago Sun-Times, the 2-Star General wanted my ass on a platter,” he says. “Then it got messy.” The military sent an agent from California who was a gang specialist for the San Bernardino Sheriff Department in California. Two agents sat Stoleson down and spent a whole day going through his documentation which included hundreds of pictures. “My captain came through and was amazed when the CID agents looked at him and said his sergeant was right: they had a problem and he had a set of balls for what he did.”

But Stoleson wasn’t treated like the hero he was; he was ostracized. “I was not allowed to do convoys for forty-five days because there were death threats up north on military bases on me,” he says. “Nice from your own troops, eh?” The command sent him south into Kuwait instead, and on his first day there he saw gang graffiti nearby. “Then I went to a place we called Area 51 which was 90 percent covered with gang graffiti and after taking pictures only then did I call the CID agents and within two days it was closed.” But soon the case was given to another CID agent. “He wasn’t so agreeing with the pictures,” says Stoleson. “Go figure,” he adds, “it’s not what they wanted to hear.” The new CID agent called the commander of Stoleson’s unit and told him he was coming over to inspect the soldiers in it in three days time. “That’s like a cop telling a drug dealer ‘hey, drug bust tomorrow at 3 p.m.,’” says Stoleson. The commander merely cleared out anyone suspicious and made sure others were on a mission. Soon after, the commander of the unit called Stoleson’s captain and said that Stoleson’s safety could no longer be guaranteed. It was a diversion tactic. “In fact, the unit had been brought under investigation several times already while in country for false documents relating to firefights, but they were sealed.” When they finally let him go home, Stoleson was sent several memos from the Central Command stating that he was under threat of court-martial, loss of rank, and imprisonment if he did not realize that what he had seen and documented was classified and secret and he must never speak about it. “I even had a captain tell me he would see that I would be thrown out and disgraced and never be allowed to talk about it,” he says. “I was told I would never be promoted, had my job threatened, my life, my daughter’s life threatened. I got a price on my head on the streets.” The pressure of the threats to his family eventually led to his divorce. “When they need info about it it's OK, then they call and expect me to give it. But of course, no way, I am non-cooperative; I am doing this for myself, not watered down so it is what they want to hear."

Stoleson is not optimistic about how this will end. "Now the cartels are in our military and have proven they can and will use their power," he says. "Just look at the murders recently at Fort Bliss, Texas, by troops . . . They say 10 percent of the military is gangs. I say 15 or a little more just because they are becoming a more educated bunch, not showing the tattoos and flying the colors . . . It's bad, don't even fool yourself," he continues. "Law enforcement isn't taking this any more serious than ever. The DOD has told us to leave the bikers alone, which are some of the most dangerous and fly full colors and are involved in white power groups." He adds, "There is no room for any gang member prior or present in the military. If they are allowed, the cancer of our streets here in the States may one day run the most violent army in the world." But the military only ever punished Stoleson for his bravery in speaking up. "Oh Jeff, they tried to destroy him," Hunter Glass tells me. "They wanted him gone, he was showing them up." They were nearly successful. When I last speak to Stoleson he tells me he has just been approved for admittance to the VA for nine weeks of treatment for PTSD.

Back in the US it was the same story of shooting the messenger. At Fort Sill the problem again raised its head when Specialist Gregory Darnell King, a reservist in the 177th Field Artillery Battalion, was arrested six times by local police for a variety of offenses, including drugs possession. He was seen showing the hand signs for the 107 Hoover Crips and was believed to be a member. The head of the police gang investigations team, Lieutenant Darnell Southerland, warned, "People don't want to face the truth but it's true. Fort Sill still has a problem with gangs. We see it every Friday and Saturday nights on the streets. But nobody wants to listen."[60] The army didn't want to know and shot the messenger again. Southerland, the brave whistle-blower, was "completely inaccurate and totally outdated," an army spokesman said.[61] They went further to say that none of their soldiers had been arrested on "gang-related charges" that year. It was the same tactic of plausible deniability that the military used in relation to white supremacists.

Even when cases did make it into the law courts, there was a strange aversion to convictions. Army Private Jamal Rashad Davis of the Eleventh Air Defense Brigade was alleged to have shot and killed nineteen-year-old Jurell Battles during a Christmas Day fight in northeast El Paso in 2004. Investigators believed that the murder was gang related because of Davis's close connections with the Folk Nation gang. Another man who had been shot in the incident identified Davis in a police line-up and the soldier received a general discharge from the army in February 2005, although the military denied this was related to the murder case. After his arrest, Davis's case took four years to move towards trial stage. But before that could happen, District Attorney Jaime Esparza dismissed the murder case in October 2009, citing lack of sufficient evidence to obtain a conviction. It was clear something had gone very wrong with the investigation, as there were no other suspects. John L. Williams, Davis's attorney, denied that his client had been associated with the Folk Nation, saying by way of extenuation, "My guy was in the military. He was a Louisiana choirboy and his stepdad is in law enforcement." Davis was sent back to college where he was studying engineering.

Rearing Its Head

With so little being done by the military and law enforcement, the situation started to spiral out of control. By early 2006 it was seriously impacting on the military's plans for basic domestic troop movements. When the army unveiled its plan to reposition a tranche of soldiers to El Paso, Texas, as part of an efficiency savings program, law enforcement officials feared that it "could trigger a battle the military has not trained for—a turf war between violent criminal gangs."[62] The military wanted to move between ten and twenty thousand troops, but in that group there was a large contingent suspected of belonging to the Folk Nation, the umbrella group for a collection of Chicago-based street gangs. The El Paso area, however, was already home to another sizeable and powerful criminal outfit by the name of Barrio Azteca, a Texas-based prison gang. The DOD was so concerned it set up a special office in El Paso with the sole remit of weeding out Folk Nation members from the new soldiers who arrived. An FBI agent confided with serious understatement: "Our understanding is that Folk Nation has a presence in the military." She predicted that about 800 people were linked to the gang in El Paso, of which about 80, including military personnel and members of their families, were actively committing crimes. "It is my understanding that the police department in Killeen [in Texas] has reported a gang problem where military-affiliated people are involved," she added.

There were two problems that sounded ominous—the spread of gangs to the young in the area, and weapons training. “The intelligence that we have thus far indicates that they may try to recruit young people who have clean records and encourage them to keep their record clean to get into the military,” she said. “They would get great weapons training and other types of training and access to weapons and arms, and be able to use that knowledge.” The military denied it, with Nancy Hutchinson, public affairs officer for the Army Recruiting Battalion-Phoenix Headquarters that includes the El Paso area, saying simply that gang members or those with gang tattoos are barred from the military.

Although publicly there was a deafening silence from the military community, the murmurs from inside were increasing and filtering up to the lawmakers. In a Congress of 535 elected officials, just one lone Congressman, Representative Mike Thomson (D-CA) decided that enough was enough and introduced an amendment to the 2008 National Defense Authorization Bill which stated that the DOD would have to “prescribe regulations to prohibit the active participation of military personnel in street gangs.”[63] The bill passed through the House and Senate with the amendment, but was eventually vetoed by Bush, one of twelve presidential vetoes during his time in power. Thomson’s reasoning for sticking his head above the parapet was simple: he didn’t believe the military was doing its job. “I’ve heard from police officers across the country that there are problems with gangs on posts,” he said. “The FBI suggests there are problems not only in the states but on bases abroad. So somebody hasn’t been serious enough.”[64] It was clear who he was talking about. His aim, he said, was to make sure different agencies were sharing their information in order to close down the opportunities for gang members to enlist, calling the problem “a serious danger to society.”[65] That danger was clear in the statement he posted with the amendment: “This is an important amendment that is a first step in solving a very serious problem on our military bases both here in the States and abroad; and it is a problem that, unfortunately, spills over into our communities. This is the issue of members of criminal street gangs joining the military and getting the training that they get in the military and now, unfortunately, on the battlefield, and then bringing that back into the community and deploying those tactics on the streets in our neighborhood.”[66]

In 2009, another FBI report, this time focusing on the threat gangs posed to the US, registered the effect of the military’s willingness to turn a blind eye: “Gang migration from larger cities to suburban and rural areas is an ongoing concern for law enforcement,” it said. Its data showed that the percentage of law enforcement agencies in the United States reporting gang activity in their jurisdictions increased from 45 percent in 2004 to 58 percent in 2008. Gang membership was estimated conservatively at 1 million members in 2009, a 25 percent increase from 800,000 in 2005.[67] By 2007, the army reported seventy-nine separate gang incidents in the year, crimes which included drug dealing, homicide, and robbery—and these gangs were not just terrorizing each other. The report noted: “Military-trained gang members . . . present an emerging threat to law enforcement officers patrolling the streets of US cities.”[68] For the gangs, this was always the desired endgame. Those serving in the desert may have paid lip-service to their love of US-style freedom and democracy, but in truth the military was a training camp for the skills they required to combat law enforcement agencies and their gangland enemies back home. The FBI said as much in its report: “Military training could ultimately result in more sophisticated and deadly gangs.”[69] “Gangs are gaining strength across the United States,” added Hunter Glass. “The numbers are increasing like crazy around the US and adding this extra fuel is just not going to help matters.”[70] It was fuelling crime all over America, with 80 percent of offenses being committed by gang members in some communities.[71] An FBI agent confided that gangs “will hand pick [recruits], ask them to keep their record clear so that they can enlist in the military and then once they’re in the military, they want them to try and gain access to weapons and explosives and basically try to filter that back to the street level.”[72]

One potent warning about how this would end came early on, one evening in January 2005: A call came in to the local Ceres, California, police department from someone who claimed to be a store employee and requesting help from a single police officer at Sequoia Market. Soon after a second call came from the area with a report that a man was lurking and acting suspiciously with a gun. A short time later, three policemen showed up. Waiting for them was Andres Raya, a nineteen-year-old veteran who had spent seven months in Iraq in 2004 but hadn’t seen any combat. On this night he was determined to make up for it, and had armed himself with a high-powered assault rifle for the task. When the policemen arrived, Raya started shooting. Trainee Chris Melton managed to take cover, but his colleague Sam Ryno was hit, sustaining what turned out to be career-ending injuries. The other policeman, Sergeant Howard Stevenson, then fired off eight rounds before taking bullets in the back and leg. Raya walked slowly towards him and unloaded two bullets into his head at point blank range. Later that evening Raya was killed in a firefight with another set of police officers. Taking out two armed police officers is no easy task and would likely not have been possible without Raya's military training. It was later revealed that before the attack Raya had bragged to his friends in the Marines that he would use the assault rifle because of its ability to pierce police body armor, knowledge he probably gained in Iraq. He also used a marine technique known as "cutting the pie" whereby he went on the attack instead of retreating. In the subsequent investigation, it was revealed he was member of the powerful Norteño organization, a group of Latino gangs out of northern California. A police report concluded: "Although—while in Iraq—the gang member had not experienced any combat, he used his military training to shoot out the windows of a nearby vehicle to use as a shield in his attack against officers."[73] Ceres Police Chief Art de Werk said: "It was so rare, an almost unheard-of, brazen attack."[74]

But this was 2005. America was about to change. The aftermath of the murder brought the already tense relationship between the police and the local Latin population to a new low as police conducted a series of "sweeps" for suspected gang members as well as drugs and weapons in Ceres and south Modesto. It fundamentally altered how law enforcement agencies viewed the threat from gangs on the streets of the US. They were now dealing with fully trained warriors. "Gang members have enlisted since the 1980s," said a police report.[75] "However, following the January 9, 2005 attack of two police officers, law enforcement authorities began paying closer attention to gang members in the military and discovering skills and knowledge in the tactics, and access to military weapons were also being used to benefit gang members." But law enforcement was helpless when confronted with a military establishment desperate for more wood to throw into the fire in the Middle East, so nothing was done to address the situation. By late 2009, the heavily armed gang problem had got so bad in Salinas, California, that city officials turned to the military for help. They started working with combat veterans and lecturers at the Naval Postgraduate School to devise a counterinsurgency operation likened by the veterans to those fought against insurgents on the streets of Mogadishu or Fallujah. In April 2010 the National Guard was called out to police the streets of Chicago. Local lawmakers said they were needed to "stabilize communities," just as had been done in the Middle East occupations.

The Cancer Spreads

Meanwhile, on the southern border of the US another problem was flaring up. In December 2006, Mexican President Felipe Calderón sent the nation's military to get a grip on the drug-related violence that was ripping apart towns on the northern border. The campaign's success over the ensuing years was muted to say the least: the number of people killed increased every year subsequently. In 2009 alone there were 6,500 drug-related murders in the country. To put that in perspective: after eight years of continuous war, 5,600 Americans had fallen in Iraq and Afghanistan.[76] Both are tragically high figures, but the links were rarely pointed out. One of the manifold problems that the proliferation of criminal gangs in the military has exacerbated in the US, and by extension Mexico, is the drug trade. The illegal drug industry is wholly administered by street gangs, which operate on both sides of the border to get drugs onto the streets of America and cash the gargantuan profits. The military environment is a godsend for such operations, for obvious reasons. The ability to move around, the relative protection afforded by being a soldier, and the ability to work in large concentrations all suit the needs of a drug trafficker. As the FBI cautioned in 2009, a "rising number of U.S.-based gangs are seemingly intent on developing working relationships with U.S.- and foreign-based drug trafficking organizations and other criminal organizations to gain direct access to foreign sources of illicit drugs."[77] It continued, "gangs have . . . been known to use active-duty service members to distribute drugs." The Justice Department reported that members of the Latin Kings gang in Midland, Texas, purchase cocaine from Mexican traffickers for between $16,000 and $18,000 a kilogram. It is then shipped on to Chicago where a kilogram may cost up to $30,000.[78] Elements in the US military are often used as a conduit. The situation became so serious that in 2010, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in Mexico City that gangs "are fighting against both of our governments" before pledging $1.6 billion in US aid for the Merida Initiative aimed at fighting drug cartels. She told the Mexican government: "This new agenda expands our focus beyond disrupting drug organizations" to include "strengthening a 21st Century border, and building strong, resilient communities."[79] She didn't mention the sterling work the US's own military has been doing in training the traffickers. One of these alleged military-trained cartel soldiers was eighteen-year-old Army Private Michael Jackson Apodaca, based at Fort Bliss, Texas, the center of a lot of the activity. In August 2009 he was charged with the murder of a lieutenant in the Juarez drug cartel, José Daniel Gonzalez Galeana, who was shot eight times in El Paso outside his luxurious $365,000 Mediterranean villa, complete with tile roof and swimming pool. Apodaca was allegedly hired alongside another man in the contract killing by a member of the same cartel.[80] The LA Times reported that the "killing was prompted by suspicions that Gonzalez was either an informant or had trade alliances amid the Juarez cartel's violent battle with rival drug gangs for control of Ciudad Juarez, just across the Rio Grande from El Paso."[81] A spokeswoman for Fort Bliss merely stated: "Anytime someone does something like this, and a soldier in our case, it's terrible."[82] But it wasn't terrible enough for the military to take a look in the mirror.

These same gangs were also trafficking drugs from Iraq and Afghanistan. "We'd stop convoys at the border, both military and civilian, and we would find heroin and hash and lots of cash," Stoleson tells me. "The biggest was around 750 kilos and $500k in cash." He says you could pick up a camel shoe of hash or heroin on the Iran border for $1,200 and transport it to the Syrian border, making up to $25,000 per shoe or kilo, and it was a big industry until the border controls were tightened up in 2006, when the threat of bombings in Kuwait became a reality (Stoleson was in Camp Navistar in Kuwait, which was just forty miles from Iran). "But we had a Latin King from New York getting pot shipped to him and dealing on base," he added. "I turned in a Latin King by noticing his [tattoos] and nothing happened." They were even planning trafficking from Latin America to the US while deployed. "I overheard two troops talking about working with [Mexican drug gang] Zetas to move product from his cousin in Colombia to the States," added Stoleson. His claims were given further credence in early 2012 when a drug ring "kill-team" composed of veterans and active-duty US military personnel was broken up by drug enforcement agents. The men involved—led by First Lieutenant Kevin Corley—were under the impression that the violent, mass-murdering Mexican drug cartel, the Zetas, had hired them. They were not naïve—it was becoming increasingly common, as the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) was only too well aware, hence the methodology of the sting operation. As InSight Crime magazine, which covers organized crime throughout the Americas, reported:

> On March 24, First Lt. Kevin Corley arrived with a three-man team at a warehouse in the border city of Laredo, Texas, armed with two semiautomatic rifles, a combat knife and a .300-caliber bolt-action rifle equipped with a scope. The men believed they had been hired by the Zetas to carry out a contracted killing and raid of a rival drug trafficking group's storehouse, and had been called to receive the final details of the assignment.[83]

Corley had been conferring with DEA agents posing as Zetas for six months, and promised to carry out assassinations for them in the US, which are known in the business as "wet work." Aware of his privileged status as a US soldier, Corley had boasted to his would-be paymasters of the ease with which he could steal weapons from where he was posted in Colorado. It wasn't just bluster. He allegedly provided agents with "bulletproof vests, training manuals and other stolen military equipment." They were the same kind of products you could now find on sale on eBay courtesy of the US military. In America in 2012, none of this was not out of the ordinary.

But inter-gang violence, while prevalent on the streets of Los Angeles and Chicago, has not erupted into full-scale war within the US military, mainly because gangs like the Bloods, Crips, and Gangster Disciples have pooled their resources and embarked on joint criminal enterprises, including but not limited to drug trafficking. The FBI reports that "rival gang members at Fort Bliss . . . have joined forces to commit assaults on civilian gang members."[84] One of those alleged to have been involved was Jerell Hill, an eighteen-year-old soldier who was arrested at Fort Sill, a military base in Oklahoma, in October 2007, and charged with attempted murder in connection with the shooting of five people in the Barclay neighborhood of his hometown, Baltimore. Investigators suspected Hill of being a member of the Pasadena Denver Lane gang, a local Bloods group, while the five shot—including a sixteen-year-old and a woman—allegedly had links to a rival gang called the Young Gorilla Family. Both gangs had a history of homicides which had brought the number of slayings in Baltimore to a stunning 240 by October of that year. Hill's father was incredulous, telling the press: "He had a little gang he hung out with . . . As far as calling them one of these Bloods or Crips, I have no idea about that."[85] But he need not have worried, as two days later the prosecutors dropped the case, saying it was "legally insufficient" but that Hill would remain a "person of interest."[86] Hill's parents claimed that he had returned to Oklahoma on September 11, long before the September 20 murder. But police drew attention to the fact he had only checked into Fort Sill on September 21. Police said they would continue to investigate his whereabouts in that interregnum. In the meantime, Hill was sent back to Fort Sill and returned to active duty.

Scott Barfield was a Defense Department gang detective at Fort Lewis in Washington state before he was ejected for raising the alarm in the media. "I have identified 320 soldiers as gang members from April 2002 to present," he said in 2006, before adding, "I think that's the tip of the iceberg." At a later stage he said, "a friend of mine is a recruiter. They are being told less than five tattoos is not an issue. More than five, you do a waiver saying it's not gang-related. You'll see soldiers with a six-pointed star with GD [Gangster Disciples] on the right forearm." An investigation by Stars and Stripes, the military journal, found that the number of gang-related incidents officially recorded by the army was small in 2007 at sixty, but that had nearly tripled from the year before. The 2007 report stated the extent of the problem at Fort Bliss: "Since 2004, the FBI and El Paso Police Department have identified over 40 military-affiliated Folk Nation gang members stationed at the Fort Bliss Army Installation in Texas who have been involved in drug distribution, robberies, assaults, weapons offenses, and a homicide, both on and off the installation." In May 2005, eight US soldiers were charged with participating in a widespread bribery and extortion conspiracy. FBI source information revealed that several military personnel stationed in Colombia had "transported forty-six kilograms of cocaine to El Paso."[87]

Weapons Training

While some gang members may enlist to escape their lifestyle, or as an alternative to incarceration (having been offered clemency in exchange for service), most enlist to receive weapons and combat training. One of the main dangers of the proliferation of gang members in the military is the access they gain to the top weapons in the world, along with the attendant training in how to use them. "While in the military, enlisted members are exposed to high-power weapons, such as machine guns and rocket launchers, and explosives, such as grenades and C-5—as well as body armor night-vision devices, gun parts, and ammunition," said the California Department of Justice in 2005.[88] It warned that "enlisted personnel are able to steal items by improperly documenting supply orders or by falsifying paperwork." Throughout the War on Terror there have been countless cases of gang members stealing weapons and selling them on, as well as using their military training to heighten their effectiveness when carrying out a crime. A concerned Milwaukee, Wisconsin, police detective complained to the San Francisco Chronicle that "gang members are going over to Iraq and sending weapons back." And sure enough in 2006, a former National Guard soldier was arraigned in federal court after being accused of bringing machine guns back to the US from Iraq to sell to a gun dealer in Georgia.[89] A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report found that stolen US military equipment, including body armor, night vision goggles, and gear to protect against nuclear or biochemical warfare, was being sold on Craigslist and eBay.[90] America was becoming a warzone. In El Paso, members of the city council decided they needed to tool up. They didn't want to take any risks and approved the purchase of 1,145 assault rifles for $750,000 in order to supply all their officers with the civilian version of the M-4 military rifle. Representative Steve Ortega of District 7 said there had to be precautions to help "a population coming back from an extremely violent environment integrating with the civilian population," adding "we want to make sure that the police department has all the resources it needs to make us the safest city in the nation."[91]

It was not hyperbole. In 2004, a fearless gang had begun a two month orgy of "commando-style" robberies in which they raided six banks in Maryland using fully automatic assault rifles, managing to cash in more than $350,000 and terrorize local citizens before being caught.[92] It was revealed subsequently that the military-style operations were in fact made possible by the weapons which had been bought for $5,000 from a friend of one of the gang members, recently returned from Iraq. The police kept the soldier's identity secret but said he was based at nearby Fort Meade. The weapons, which are "plentiful and cheap" in Iraq, according to the Washington Post, "were key to their strategy: using overwhelming firepower and body armor to frighten and intimidate bank employees and customers—and ward off police." It worked. In the middle of their crime spree, Kate Collins, a police officer, pursued the getaway van shortly after the gang robbed a Chevy Chase Bank branch in Temple Hills. The robbers fired their machine guns in the officer's direction as they fled the scene. "I felt my car shake," she said. Collins was alone in her vehicle, armed with only a 9mm handgun. It wasn't a fair match; by the end of the firefight her car had been hit forty-seven times. "I had a BB gun compared to them," she complained. The Post reported at the time: "Law enforcement officials expressed concern that more high-powered battle weapons could end up being used in crimes against U.S. citizens and police." A law enforcement official familiar with the case commented that winning prosecutions was a hard business before adding that screening for equipment sent back to the US by military members was nearly non-existent. In other words, there was little either law enforcement agencies or American civilians could do in the face of the onslaught. Baghdad had come to Temple Hills.

In 2008, as the Bush administration drew to a close, General David Petraeus, then commanding general in Iraq, went to Washington, DC, to testify in Congress about progress in the troubled country. The political and media world gathered hoping to hear hopeful signals from the four-star general, but right-wing Republican Representative Tom Tancredo shocked the room by raising what many lawmakers thought was an obscure topic. "The fact that gang members are being trained in our military is a growing cause for concern," he told Petraeus. "Our local law enforcement officers and gang units are now facing criminals who have obtained advanced weapons and training courtesy of the U.S. taxpayer." Then he began to show a hint of anger. "I find it very disconcerting that there are high-level military officials that are unaware of this growing problem. This is a serious issue that deserves serious attention from the Pentagon brass."[93] In response, Petraeus merely confirmed Tancredo's worst fears, saying that he was not aware of gang activity in Iraq before promising to look into it. Of course, he never did. In truth, the military brass could not have been unaware of what was happening all along—all they needed to do was pick up a local newspaper across the country. But they couldn't afford to slow down and instead of stemming the tide their program was only making it worse. The one regulation that had previously stopped the gangs' infiltration, the ban on felons and other persistent criminals, was falling away as well.

WAR CRIMINALS

My main preoccupation in life is wanting to kill Iraqis, whoever they are and wherever they are.

Steven D. Green, Iraq veteran and recipient of a "moral waiver" to serve, 2006[94]

In broad daylight on March 12, 2006, one of most horrific of the reported atrocities by the US military in Iraq was underway in a house near Yusufiyah, a town just south of Baghdad. A group from the Black Heart Brigade of the 101st Airborne Division, famed for its courageous exploits during World War Two, had arrived at a family home fresh from a long drinking session of locally made whiskey, or what the soldiers called with disdain "hajji juice." The men were frustrated, some at the end of their tether, after promises that they would soon leave the Triangle of Death, an area renowned for its high levels of violence and chaos, were consistently broken by their commanders. The tension had been compounded in recent days by the death of a sergeant close to the group, killed by an IED. The house in question was in close proximity to the checkpoint manned by the soldiers, some of whom over the past months had had their eye on the fourteen-year-old daughter of the couple who lived there. Conversations often involved fantasies about raping her; that day, they resolved to do it. They were led by Private First Class Steven D. Green, who had already been showing increasing signs of mental breakdown and illness, telling a combat-stress adviser sometime before of his overriding desire to kill Iraqis. On that day, he was on guard at a traffic control point and had been on duty eighteen hours. He told the other soldiers: "I'm going to waste a bunch of dudes in a car." Not good enough, replied another soldier, James Barker, who told him: "I've got a better idea. We've all killed hajjis, but I've been here twice and I still never fucked one of these bitches."[95] The planned murders would actually only be the coda to a long day of crimes around checkpoints, which were a signature of the conflict. Earlier amid chaos at that same checkpoint, one soldier had opened fire, allegedly to restore order among a crowd, with one shot killing a woman in a pickup truck. "You fucking shot her in the head," exclaimed another soldier. The squad, according to one of its members, fabricated a cover story to explain the shooting. Army investigators found no evidence of wrongdoing.

It was in that frame of mind they arrived at the house that night and separated the girl, Abeer Qasim Hamza al-Janabi, from her family. Green went into the room where Abeer's parents were and shot them dead, along with their six-year-old daughter. Meanwhile, two other soldiers raped the young girl. When Green came back he raped her as well before using the family's own AK-47 to shoot the girl in the head. The soldiers then burnt the house to the ground with the bodies inside. For three months nothing happened as the military believed the lie that it had been the work of Iraqi insurgents. In the Iraq War logs, released by Wikileaks, it wasn't even recorded.[96] In Mahmudiyah—the nearest major town to Yusifiyah—on that day, there were no significant activity reports detailing what the soldiers had done. There was no report of a family's death in a burning house, or the charred corpse of a raped fourteen-year-old girl. It would have stayed that way, as many massacres of its kind undoubtedly have in Afghanistan and Iraq, except for the conscience of one of the soldiers in the battalion, Justin Watt. After a period of soul-searching he told officers that he had heard it was in fact soldiers in his own unit who had carried it out. Even then the military refused to believe him, not even taking precautions about the threat to his life from the soldiers who had learned that he had spoken up.

In the eventual trial of those guilty, the level of incompetence in the military became horrendously clear. Testimony during the trial of Green revealed that an army counselor had called the unit "mission incapable" and recommended that it stop taking on missions due to high levels of stress, anger, and diminished morale. That didn't happen, although before the allegations and criminal proceedings got underway, Green was discharged from the army with a "personality disorder." In the end, he was given five life sentences. The defense had argued that the military should have withdrawn Green long before the massacre, and they had a sterling case. About a year earlier, in January 2005, Green was a high school dropout with too much time on his hands and soon to land himself in jail. He was convicted on alcohol possession charges, which was his third misdemeanor conviction. After he got out he decided to enlist in the military, a course that would—because of those convictions—require special dispensation because of his criminal record. It also emerged that he had unpaid fines against his name, and court records showed it had instructed "he must contact the court immediately." Instead of doing so, Green was deployed to Iraq as part of the 101st Airborne Division, where he would go on to rape and murder. His journey from criminal to soldier was, however, becoming increasingly common.

Immoral Waivers

The Department of Justice cites losing your "right" to serve in the military as one consequence of a felony conviction, and those like Private Green with multiple civil convictions for what the army considers to be misdemeanor offenses also lose their automatic right to serve. But in both cases there is a system in place to give ex-cons a second chance. "Exceptions to the prohibition on military enlistment . . . may be authorized by the Secretary of the affected branch of the service in meritorious cases," says the guidance.[97] In military jargon these "meritorious cases" warrant what are called "moral waivers," by which a moral failing in the past may be overlooked and the individual allowed to serve their country depending on the circumstances "surrounding the criminal violations, the age of the person committing them, and personal interviews."[98] For obvious reasons—not least that of offering former criminals a second chance—the moral waiver system has its uses and is an old institution founded on the valuable principle that society shouldn't be closed to someone for a single transgression. The Pentagon puts it this way: "The waiver process recognizes that some young people have made mistakes, have overcome their past behavior, and have clearly demonstrated the potential for being productive, law-abiding citizens and members of the military."[99] But like most well-intentioned (and discretionary) pieces of military regulation, during the War on Terror it was exploited and stretched to the maximum by the Pentagon as it struggled to keep up troop numbers.

It took a report from the Palm Center at the University of California, Santa Barbara—a group committed to discussion of homosexuals in the military—to blow the lid on figures the military brass were trying hard to cover up. In 2007 it published information obtained through the Freedom of Information Act which led it to call the proliferation of ex-cons in the military a "major recruitment trend" which it said was "a cause, effect, or even correction of the military's apparent recruitment problem."[100] It found the number of convicted felons enlisting in the US military nearly doubled in two years, from 824 in 2004 to 1,605 in 2006. In that period a total of 4,230 convicted felons were enlisted in the military, including people guilty of rape and murder. On top of this, 43,977 soldiers signed up who had been found guilty of a serious misdemeanor, which includes assault. Another 58,561 had drug-related convictions, but all were handed a gun and sent off to the Middle East. "The fact that the military has allowed more than 100,000 people with such troubled pasts to join its ranks over the past three years illustrates the problem we're having meeting our military needs in this time of war," said Aaron Belkin, director of the Palm Center.[101]

But in the face of this dangerous trend, the media focus remained mostly on cases where felons were shown to be upstanding and trusted soldiers when given a chance—what I call the narrative of the "noble felon." The case of Osvaldo Hernandez, for example, drew national attention after he was allowed to serve in the Middle East, but then turned down for a job with the New York Police Department on his return home. His moral rectitude was good enough for an M-16 in Afghanistan, but not for the Upper East Side. In 2002, when he was twenty, he had been caught with an unlicensed loaded gun in his car and had served a year in prison. He was the lucky recipient of a moral waiver and deployed in 2007 with the Eighty-Second Airborne in Afghanistan, where he spent fifteen months mostly in Ghazni province. Despite returning with a trophy cabinet of accolades, including a Combat Infantry Badge, two Army Commendation Medals, and three Army Achievement Medals, this didn't help him in his application to join the NYPD, which does not have moral waivers like the military. "I just want to take my experience in the military and put it forth in New York City . . . I want to continue to do public service. I grew up in New York City, so that's just where I want to give back," he told the New York Times.[102] Luckily for Hernandez, this ridiculous contradiction between military and police regulation led to a public backlash and the then-Governor of New York, David A. Paterson, granting him a pardon for his felony. "Gov. Paterson did the right thing by pardoning Spec. Osvaldo Hernandez from a felony conviction that barred him from achieving the dream of becoming a cop," said the New York Daily News at the time.[103] Another case was that of Nasser Hempel, who signed up for the army in October 2006 after spending eleven years in a succession of maximum security prisons in Texas for a robbery he committed in 1991.[104] He was involved in two riots and twelve fist-fights in his first month in prison. Hearing about 9/11 from behind bars changed him and led him to want to sign up to defend his country. "I remember how helpless I felt being stuck behind millions of dollars of concrete and steel while America was under attack," he said. "For a guy who built his reputation on fear and violence in prison, that feeling I had that day was something I've never experienced. That's the day I realized the world was bigger than me."[105] Soon after he was an Army Reserve corporal serving in Baghdad, having received a moral waiver.

One Hundred Hadithas

During the War on Terror, however, not all felons managed to put their indiscretions behind them as the media and military liked to suggest. A raft of research has highlighted the detrimental effect allowing ex-cons to serve in the military has had on the institution itself and on the civilian community being policed by them. Aside from atrocities (like those in Yusufiyah) that were arguably a consequence of recruiting more ex-cons, research has shown that these recruitment practices engender a lack of stability and cohesion within the ranks. A report from the Center for Naval Analyses pointed to higher attrition rates for those with waivers, who were "quite a bit more likely" than those without to get a misconduct charge and be separated from service within their first two years.[106] It reported that "recruits with felony waivers have the highest chance of a misconduct separation."[107] A GAO report that studied attrition rates from 1990 to 1993 had already supported this conclusion, finding that recruits granted moral waivers are more likely to be discharged from the air force because of misconduct.[108] The consensus went even further. "Unsuitability is by far the most common reason for service member attrition," added a 2007 Palm Center report.[109] "Nearly all research on the relationship between offense history and unsuitability attrition points to the unsurprising conclusion that recruits with criminal backgrounds are more likely to be discharged prematurely than those without such backgrounds."

The Pentagon knew it couldn't slow down, but that didn't stop concerns from being expressed within the military community itself. There was a glaring problem with putting a gun in the hands of a convicted criminal and sending them off to a war where they would be expected to kill. John D. Hutson, dean and president of the Franklin Pierce Law Center in New Hampshire and former judge advocate general of the navy, cautioned: "If you are recruiting somebody who has demonstrated some sort of antisocial behavior and then you are a putting a gun in their hands, you have to be awfully careful about what you are doing. You are not putting a hammer in their hands, or asking them to sell used cars. You are potentially asking them to kill people."[110] Christine Wormuth, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, acknowledged that criminal records are "absolutely an important indicator," before adding the caveat that "it won't mean 100 more Hadithas or cases of soldier abuse," referring to another massacre of civilians in Iraq. "The numbers seem pretty clear to me that we are lowering standards and it's difficult for me to see how that wouldn't have a negative impact on the quality of the force."[111]

Wormuth may have been right that linking atrocities in Afghanistan and Iraq to moral waivers is impossible to do with any certainty, but the anecdotal evidence indicates that the negative impact was shocking. On New Year's Eve 2006, Lance Corporal Delano Holmes, a twenty-two-year-old marine who had been in Iraq for only three months, was on sentry duty in Fallujah, then the country's most dangerous city and a focal point for opposition to the US occupation. His partner on watch that night was army Private Munther Jasem Muhammed Hassin, a soldier from an Iraqi army unit that was helping the US in their attempt to stabilize the city. A few hours into their shift, Private Hassin decided to light a cigarette, a popular pastime for most Iraqis. Lance Corporal Holmes objected, saying the lit end would alert snipers to their whereabouts, and told Hassin to put it out immediately. When his partner just laughed it off Holmes went ballistic, repeatedly stabbing Hassin with a thirteen-inch bayonet. According to the autopsy report, Hassin's body had seventeen stab wounds, twenty-six slashes and a face injury that had just about severed his nose.[112] A year later, in December 2007, a military jury at Camp Pendleton, California, found Holmes guilty of negligent homicide and of making a false statement. He was sentenced to only ten months in jail, effectively time served—in other words, he was a free man. At the court-martial, the prosecutors said Holmes had fired Hassin's AK-47 afterward to make the cold-blooded murder look like self-defense, a common military ruse. Newspaper reports of the trial said that Holmes's "eyes filled with tears so large that they could be seen falling on the lectern from across the room."[113] He told the jury he saw himself as a warrior and a Christian. "God gave me more than I could handle," he informed them. It would have been more accurate had he replaced "God" with "the US military." The military, however, would show further clemency two years later when an appeals court overturned the conviction. It was the last stage in a long line of betrayals by the US military which failed its Iraqi partner Hassin and cost him his life. For a start, Holmes should never have been in Iraq: he had a checkered mental and legal history that should have alerted his recruiters and superiors. At high school he had threatened to commit suicide and had to be hospitalized and was later accused of assault, trespassing, and disorderly conduct. As close as a few months before deployment he was linked to drug use twice. But defense attorneys said Holmes had been given a cocktail of drugs by military medical staff including Ambien, a sleep medication. According to the Macon Telegraph, a local newspaper that carried out extensive investigations, "military officials didn't publicly blame the war in Iraq, but some privately acknowledged it is why they accept individuals who previously would have been rejected." When asked how someone like Holmes could have been deployed to Iraq,

Marine Captain Brett Miner, a prosecutor at the court-martial, said simply, "We're kind of short on bodies."

Fight Back

Concerned veterans' groups picked up on the waiver system and urged the military to offer different incentives to recruits to end the necessity for the practice—such as an updated version of the GI Bill, which had provided education training to World War Two veterans, or better health care for reservists. "These are safer strategies for attracting a solid core of defenders for our country," said Perry Jefferies, *t*he veterans' outreach director for Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "The phrase 'moral waivers' euphemizes the real problem," he added, "which is that some of these new soldiers are dangerous criminals. It is hard to capture the true effect of a violent criminal mixed into a unit with no warning and then put under tremendous stress."[114] Worried veterans were gaining support within Congress, but as usual it was left to one courageous lawmaker to blaze a trail. On this issue it was Representative Henry A. Waxman, who in his position as chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee requested details from the Pentagon on the number of service members with felony convictions, information previously withheld from the public. The data showed that army waivers for felony convictions had more than doubled in a year, from 249 waivers in 2006 to 511 in 2007, while the marines' waivers increased from 208 to 350 in the same period.[115] In a letter to David Chu, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, Waxman wrote: "The data you provided the Committee shows that there was a rapid rise in 2007 in the number of waivers the Army and Marine Corps granted to recruits convicted of serious felonies, such as aggravated assault and burglary. Some recruits were even granted waivers for felony convictions involving sexual assault and terrorist threats." Two involved planned domestic bomb attacks.[116] These convictions also included eighty-seven waivers for those convicted of assault and maiming, sometimes with a dangerous weapon. The marines also gave a number of waivers to those convicted of rape, sexual assault, incest, and other sex crimes.[117] Another lawmaker with his finger on the pulse was Representative Marty Meehan, who along with Representative Waxman was trying to get more information from the Pentagon. "The data is crystal clear," he said. "Our armed forces are under incredible strain and the only way that they can fill their recruiting quotas is by lowering their standards. By lowering standards, we are endangering the rest of our armed forces and sending the wrong message to potential recruits across the country."[118]

This unraveling of the US military's moral fiber was a large factor in the rise in criminal acts within the military: during the War on Terror, for example, one in three female soldiers reported being victims of some form of sexual assault while in service, dwarfing the one in six women in the civilian world (a development to be explored in greater detail later in the chapter). The military was on the back foot trying to explain this one away. Army Lieutenant Colonel Jonathan Withington, a Pentagon spokesman, retaliated by saying that waivers "are used judiciously and granted only after a thorough review," adding, "The Department strives to maintain high standards ensuring that military recruits surpass the overall qualifications of the contemporary American youth population."[119] Others spun it as a civil rights issue. "The thing is, you've got to give people an opportunity to serve," said Lieutenant General James D. Thurman, the army's operations chief. "We are growing the Army fast, there are some waivers . . . it hasn't alarmed us yet."[120] For some recruiters and commanders it seems soldiers with criminal records were also viewed kindly because as proven "risk-takers" they were more likely to succeed in combat. "Gang members, ex-cons, extremists, they are all more 'war-like' than your average soldier, there's no doubt that's attractive to the military, it's definitely a factor," Hunter Glass told me. Douglas Smith of Army Recruiting Command also put forward the thesis that because there "are more and more young people getting caught up in the criminal justice system than in the past," the US military has had to become more lenient to compensate. This explanation should not be dismissed. The growing numbers of Americans put behind bars was a scandal in itself. In 2008, it was found that one in one hundred adult Americans was actually behind bars, as the prison population ballooned to 1.6 million, the highest in the country's history. It was particularly acute among those segments of the population which have traditionally proven the trustiest military fodder. One in every thirty-six Hispanics was behind bars, while one in nine black men between twenty and thirty-four was also locked up.[121] To the military brass, disenfranchising vast swathes of individuals from ethnic minorities didn't make any sense; now, the government wouldn't just lock you up, it would send you to war afterward. It was a straight path, made even smoother by the fact that a felony conviction in itself makes finding work very hard—a "death sentence" according to DC Congressional Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton.[122] A newly open military became the best option for a generation of disenfranchised and desperate Americans—they could even sign up while still in prison. The situation was so farcical that by 2007 military recruiters went to the biannual jobs fair at Alexandria City Jail to try to sign up inmates close to release. "They offer a lot of opportunities for advancement, educational opportunities, vocational training, and so it's definitely a great opportunity for anyone interested," said a prison official.[123]

Criminal Denials

In 2007 there was a revealing exchange at a House Armed Services Committee hearing on army recruiting and retention. John McHugh (R-NY) was questioning the witness, Michael Dominguez, Deputy Under Secretary for Personnel and Readiness from the Department of Defense. "Just to kind of state it in a different way and put it on the record again, I would like to ask you gentlemen to state how you feel about the quality of the men and women overall that you are recruiting into the military today, and make a comment, if you will, about felons in terms of waivers if you have such a thing," asked McHugh. "I mean, generally when we talked about waivers, there is the medical waiver, there is the moral waiver, which by and large has to do with minor crimes, generally as a youth, whether it is an alcohol situation or some kind of truancy, vandalism, something like that. But are we admitting hardcore felons into the United States Army today? Did I miss something?"[124] There was a pause. Then Dominguez replied (erroneously): "We exclude members of hate groups and gangs and those kinds of things. We have very well established procedures to exclude those. We don't recruit murderers and rapists and that kind of violent criminal. What amounts to a felony in the United States of America varies from state to state." But the numbers speak for themselves. In 2005—when it missed recruitment numbers by the largest margin since 1979—the army took in 21,880 new soldiers, or 17 percent of recruits, on a waiver.[125] That's more than an entire infantry division. The situation had become so bad by 2007 that nearly one in five recruits entered the army courtesy of a waiver for a felony or misdemeanor, representing a 42 percent increase in the use of waivers since 2000. This was not normal. "They've been doing it forever, but the numbers were small," said University of Maryland military sociologist David Segal.

"It's only with the current conflict in the past couple of years that the numbers have gotten so large."[126] Back in the hearing, General Bostick then took over in a support role, using the method of exculpation outlined earlier: appealing to the noble criminal. "Corporal Vaccaro, killed in Afghanistan, 10th Mountain Division—he smoked marijuana 20 to 30 times; he saved many, many soldiers and earned a Silver Star," he said. "Those are examples of the kind of soldiers that have been given a second chance, have demonstrated before that second chance opportunity that they had overcome any misgivings they had earlier in their life. So I feel very, very confident of it." He didn't mention Steven D. Green.

Despite continued military assurances that it was not a problem, they gave the game away when the financial crisis hit and their recruitment problems abated. In 2009 the military met its recruitment targets for the first time since 2004 and pledged to lock out those with criminal records once again. Brigadier General Joseph Anderson, deputy commander of the US Army Recruiting Command, said that the "adult major misconduct" waiver, given for felony offenses, was now closed, and additionally those with a history of juvenile criminal activity would not be allowed to recruit without a high school diploma.[127] It was an admission of guilt, but for many in Iraq and Afghanistan, like Genei Nasir al-Janabi, it was too late. In February 2008, Staff Sergeant Michael A. Hensley was put on trial after he had ordered the shooting of an unarmed civilian near Iskandariya, a city in central Iraq. Hensley claimed he had to issue the order because al-Janabi had discovered his unit's hiding place, but he was later found guilty of placing a rifle next to al-Janabi's body to buttress his claims that the unit had been under attack. It was a harrowing case. "I put him face down on the ground, with my knee in his back. He started to make a lot of noise. He started to cry . . . he was yelling, I was trying to shut him up," said Hensley in his testimony.[128] The incident came on the back of a hard campaign against the insurgency in Jarf Sakhr, thirty-five miles southwest of Baghdad. The defense attorney for Evan Vela—the soldier on trial for murder after having carried out Hensley's order—blamed the intense regimen for the tragedy, a fair criticism as we will see. "They have no superpowers," he said. "When pushed beyond human ability to absorb sleep deprivation, heat exhaustion, and post-traumatic stress disorder you can expect bad judgment." Hensley added that this was nothing out of the ordinary: "We had been losing a lot of people without doing anything . . . My sergeant major told me he wanted to produce more kills and

I was the guy to make it happen."[129] The placing of an AK-47 next to the body was, as we have seen, common procedure. It was impossible to verify Hensley's claims about the episode, although his past should have alerted the military authorities. According to a family who lived in the same area as Hensley, they were so worried about his conduct nine months before his deployment that they secretly filmed him. They recounted how one morning they had awakened to screams to see Hensley threatening a woman inside a vehicle. He had pounded the car so hard that a police report said he "had bloody knuckles, and the windshield of the Jeep was broken."[130] Hensley pleaded no contest to the charges of disorderly conduct. Subsequently the eighteen-year-old who filmed the incident said: "He obviously wasn't stable, just from seeing him the 20 minutes I did."[131] The military was given a perfect excuse to bar his enlistment: Hensley had already served six months probation for a drunk driving conviction in Georgia. But they took him anyway.

The War on Women

The proliferation of serious criminals in the military was, as mentioned, among the reasons for the huge rise in crimes against female service personnel—particularly sexual abuse and rape—during the War on Terror. Andrea Neutzling was one unfortunate witness who left her decade of service in the US military during the War on Terror with deep mental and physical scars, the most painful of which were inflicted not by the enemy but by her comrades-in-arms. It wasn't meant to be like this. She had wanted to follow in her family's footsteps when she signed up for the US army in 1999: her great-grandfather had served in the Marine Corps in World War Two and Korea, while her uncle was in the navy and her dad an army veteran. It ran in the family, but she was the first woman to serve. "It was an important thing in that respect," she tells me. She signed on the dotted line when she was nineteen, but had started talking to recruiters when she was much younger. "I always knew it was what I wanted to do," she says.

Originally from a small town on the banks of the Ohio River, Neutzling was deployed to Camp Bucca in southern Iraq in the middle of 2005 as part of a military police unit where she would oversee the care of new Iraqi detainees. One day after work, still acclimatizing to her new surroundings, she waited for a friend to join her for a workout at the gym. "While I was waiting for him, two guys came up and started talking to me," she says. At the time she was living in an eight-woman tent while the group waited for their residency halls to be finished. “They were with the unit I was replacing so I went into the living quarters with them when they asked.” The men lived in a so-called “pod,” a small two-man room. “I went into there and I sat in there with the two and they were drinking Crown Royal, which is kinda like a whisky, you drink it with 7-Up or Sprite, but they shouldn’t have been drinking alcohol. I’m not sure how they got it.” Over the next twenty minutes they would brutally rape and physically assault her. “They grabbed a hold of me and told me that ‘we’re all gonna have some fun’ and if I didn’t go along with it they would be beat me and leave me naked in front the shopping facility on the base.” Understandably terrified, Neutzling focused on trying to keep herself alive, choosing not to fight back. “It was two against one so I kinda did the whole self-preservation thing, I had kids I wanted to come home to.” The men raped her repeatedly while verbally abusing her. “One guy was putting finger nails down my back and calling me a ‘whore’ and a ‘fat pig’ and that I should be grateful for all the attention I was getting from them.” After the attack, the men told her to keep her mouth shut but didn’t appear overly concerned about any consequences. “One of them pinched the inside of my thigh and told me that I should go and I shouldn’t tell anybody about it.”

Amazingly this wasn’t the first time Neutzling had been sexually assaulted while in the military. In 2002, while serving in Korea, a drunk colleague had abused her outside a latrine. Back then, when she had told her commanders, they handed out the non-sentence of five days of base restriction for the man. For this reason, after the attack at Bucca, she was reticent about telling her commanders again. “Women knew it wouldn’t be good for your career to make a fuss,” she says. In Iraq, she didn’t say anything to anybody for a week after the incident, until another woman in her unit said the men were showing a video of the rape and bragging about it. At that point she told her command. “The woman who told me was our armorer, she gave us our ammo and weapons, and when she told me that, I asked her if she wanted my ammo, because I would have shot them.” The men were scheduled to leave in three weeks and they left on time, facing no charges—a situation that remains to this day. The battalion commanders told her explicitly that the reason was they “didn’t want to leave anybody behind.” If the men had been charged, they would have had to stay in Iraq or be sent to Kuwait, and been out of action for a long period the military could ill afford. In fact, the only person to get reprimanded was Neutzling herself, who was married at the time and later chastised by her commander for "committing adultery." He told her that since the military considered the incident a case of "forced consent," an oxymoronic term for a situation where the victim is drunk or goes along with the sexual activity for his or her own protection, he considered her behavior infidelity. Sympathy was equally lacking elsewhere. The chaplain merely told her it couldn't have been rape because she didn't act like a rape victim: she wasn't visibly upset or crying. "But if he had come during the first three days afterwards, I was sleeping with my M-16 locked and loaded," she says. The military's tactic of looking the other way worked: when no one wanted to do anything for her, she just tried to block it out by concentrating on work. "I busted my butt doing my job over there," she says. Often working twelve-hour days, she was instrumental in setting up important procedures for separating detainees, after she found Sunnis and Shias were being put in the same living quarters. But none of this was rewarded as it should have been, simply because she hadn't kept her mouth shut. At the end of her tour, the brass merely gave her a "certificate of achievement," a minor recognition of service. Others who had done much less work received Bronze Stars and Army Commendation medals. Neo-Nazis had often done a lot better.

Neutzling explicitly blamed the opening up of the military to criminals (alongside its failure to kick out service members guilty of misconduct) for the treatment she received. "When I first got in they didn't have those looser standards and the first time I saw any type of sexual harassment or anything I was based in Arizona for my job training," she says. "Some guy was done for sexual assault and they sent him up the river, they spoke to every female and he got dishonorable discharge." But this all changed after 9/11. "After that you could get waivers for pretty much anything, including sex crimes and other violent offenses." She is now part of a lawsuit against the Pentagon which was filed in early 2011 and includes seventeen other service members who were subjected to sexual assaults and rape while serving in the armed forces.[132] It names as defendants Defense Secretaries Donald Rumsfeld and Robert Gates, whom it blames for a culture of punishment against women who report sexual crimes and the failure to prosecute the offenders. The charge sheet does not include Rumsfeld's opening up of the military to assorted criminals—but it could have. The lead lawyer on the case, Susan Burke, said the scale of the problem became clear when the lawsuit was made public and hundreds of women (and men) contacted her with similar stories. “We received a significant outpouring of support from both women and men soldiers,” she told me. “In addition, we have been approached by many more rape survivors.”

The lawsuit blew the lid on what had become a huge problem for the US military. By 2009, one in three of the 20,000 active-duty women serving the US military had reported being the victim of a sexual assault while serving —double the rate for civilians. Since the Pentagon began tracking assaults in 2006 under pressure from Congress, the reporting rate has risen every year.[133] The situation was so bad during the most fraught years of the War on Terror that the Pentagon belatedly decided to apply a Band-Aid, creating the Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office, or SAPRO. “What we saw during the first part of the Iraq war under Rumsfeld was that he loosened standards to what were serious crimes—rape, grand larceny—that would normally disqualify folks,” says Greg Jacobs, policy director of the Service Women’s Action Network, an organization focused on the assault and sexual abuse of women in the military. “They let a bunch in, which was a problem.” In 2009 the Pentagon reported 3,230 incidents of sexual assault which represented an 11 percent increase from the previous year. In combat zones, specifically Iraq and Afghanistan, it was even worse—rising by 16 percent.[134] In fact, US women service members are today more likely to be raped by a fellow soldier than to be killed by enemy fire. No one knows how many Iraqi or Afghan women and girls have been subjected to similar atrocities, although cases like the rapes and murders in Yusufiyah suggest it was equally endemic, and went equally unpunished. We will never know the full truth.

A further problem for women service members is that the military handles assaults of this kind in a different way than civilian law does. Military discipline is set up to ensure good order in the ranks, not justice for victims. In other words, the military handles sexual assault like it’s a matter of personal misconduct rather than a criminal offense. In New York, for example, rape is a Class B felony carrying a sentence of ten years in jail; in the military, however, you are in minority if you go to jail for rape. When the need for troops was most chronic this wiggle room allowed many rapists to escape punishment. Furthermore, the Pentagon itself estimates that as few as 13.5 percent of sexual assaults are reported and even those rarely end in prosecutions.[135] While 40 percent of sexual assault allegations in the civilian world are prosecuted, the number is just 8 percent in the military.[136] Pentagon policy also dictates that any physical evidence of a rape should be destroyed after five years, making it much harder for a service member who has been sexually assaulted to file a legal or benefit claim after they leave the military. Likewise, if the perpetrator commits another crime there's no record of the previous incident, giving them even less of an incentive to clean up their act. "Sexual assault is one of our nation's most underreported violent crimes, and is a problem worldwide. Unfortunately, our military is not immune to larger societal problems," Kaye Whitley, director of SAPRO, told me. "What is evident in the larger society is also reflected within the military." She did not mention how much worse it was for service members than for regular civilians.

Pressure from within the military as well as the latest lawsuit has had an effect on the debate in Washington, but it came far too late for thousands of women and men whose lives had already been needlessly wrecked. In April 2011 a bipartisan bill was introduced into Congress which will allow sexual abuse victims the automatic right to legal counsel, the right to a base transfer, the right to maintain confidentiality when speaking with commanders and medical staff, and will provide greater training in sexual assault prevention and response. Many asked why it had taken a decade to get to this point and why the link between the loosening of standards and the deterioration of the behavior of soldiers was still not being made, although it was clear to everyone that it was a major factor. The military had become the perfect place to be a criminal simply because in it normal legal constraints didn't apply. You could commit rape and know that there was very little chance of any penalty arising let alone a criminal prosecution. And it wasn't just rape. The military was turning a blind eye to a host of other prohibited and criminal activities as it tried to keep troop levels up, including the use of alcohol and illegal drugs, which are ostensibly banned in the military. "They didn't even get in trouble for having alcohol!" said Andrea Neutzling, exasperated at the complete impunity of the men who raped her. Unfortunately, this was not as surprising as she assumed.

CHAPTER TWO

Sick, Addicted, and Forsaken

SIPPIN' ON GIN AND HAJJI JUICE

Alcohol and drug use starts a cascade of worse problems. It's like throwing gasoline on fire.

Dr. Richard McCormick, retired director of mental health for the state veterans affairs system in Ohio, 2008[1]

In early 2004 reports began to emerge of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib prison, or Baghdad Correctional Facility as it was rechristened post-invasion. It was a notorious venue for torture and general barbarity during Saddam Hussein's twenty-five-year reign, and rumors were flying around that similar atrocities were now taking place under the auspices of the US military. It wasn't long before the mutterings were confirmed and photographs surfaced showing the physical and sexual abuse of the Iraqi detainees by grinning American troops. These included pictures of naked Iraqis piled on top of each other in a pyramid of human bodies, and of electrode treatment, among other horrors. It was a turning point in the public perception of a war we had been told was undertaken to defend human rights and democracy. The personal attempts by Donald Rumsfeld to cover it up, and his disregard for the Uniform Code of Military Justice that set the stage for the torture, likely signaled the first step towards his ignominious departure two years later. But in the long and heated debate that followed the revelations, one crucial topic was breezed over and barely considered. Many of the soldiers who had carried out the torture and humiliation of the Iraqi detainees had been drunk at the time. During its brief period under US control, Abu Ghraib had been turned into a swinging frat party with the free-flowing alcohol and ritual acts of humiliation that accompany such events on American campuses. The problem was known widely among the service members in the prison (and the military brass); in fact, weeks before the photographs were made public, commanders at Abu Ghraib had launched a crackdown on the alcohol abuse amid persistent rumors about intoxicated guards soliciting sex from Iraqi prostitutes. One army analyst at the time recalled a senior prison and interrogation officer bellowing at them: "There's a prostitution ring and a liquor smuggling ring . . . I'm going to pursue it and I hope there's no military intelligence people involved."[2]

His hopes on that score weren't realized, but the military's blushes were saved somewhat by a media blackout. In the flood of news coverage about the torture scandal, only one newspaper, the Los Angeles Times, gave serious coverage and investigative resources to the issue of alcohol abuse. In a 2004 article it reported that some officers thought alcohol consumption had been a contributing factor. At least one prisoner told investigators that they frequently smelled alcohol on the guards' breath in the cellblock where most of the abuses occurred.[3] Apparently there was even an Alcoholics Anonymous chapter at the prison. "I remember one soldier telling me he gave a [vendor] a twenty and he brought him back a bottle of alcohol," said one intelligence analyst at the prison. "They would try to bring it to you as a gift," added Lieutenant Antoine Brooks of the 870th MP Company. An investigation into abuses at the prison had cited two cases of military police officers being pulled up for alcohol consumption, but the incident was in May 2003, before Abu Ghraib was turned into an American detention center.

Since alcohol is strictly forbidden by the US military, how was this flagrant breaking of the rules allowed to go on for so long? How had this feted "liberation" turned into a frat party within a year? In truth, the obscenities at Abu Ghraib were merely the tip of a problem that penetrated deep into every level of the occupation forces during the War on Terror. The military could no longer afford—in monetary or manpower terms—to lay off or treat its most vulnerable soldiers, including alcoholics and drug addicts, and Iraqi and Afghan civilians often paid the price for their intoxication. Of course, that wasn't the message the military was putting out. In fact, looking at the discharge figures for alcohol and drug abuse during the most critical years of the War on Terror, they could be interpreted as a cause for celebration. Ostensibly, the US military enjoyed one of the most successful periods in its history in tackling alcoholism and substance abuse. According to figures obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, failure in the drug rehabilitation program resulting in discharge fell from 164 in 2002, the first full year of war, to a mere 51 in 2006. Failure in the alcoholism rehabilitation program fell from 271 in 2002 to 143 in 2006.[4] Aside from the military, there was one other group who saw this as a welcome progression: those agitating for greater rights for addicts. Robert J. Lindsey, of the National Council on Alcohol and Drug Dependence, told me, "military discrimination against alcohol and drugs users has certainly been an issue of huge concern in the past. There is absolutely no question that addiction to alcohol and drugs should be treated as a health problem not as a disciplinary one." But the War on Terror bought hope. "It's encouraging to see the numbers [of discharges] declining," he continued. "We hope that means more people are getting help." Although, he added, "It could mean they are more desperate for troops."

His second guess was the right one. Unfortunately for both the troops and the people being policed by them—who belonged to societies with deep sensitivities about alcohol—the discharge figures were a chimera: there was no sudden improvement in the treatment of addicted soldiers. What the figures revealed, rather, was a military that could just no longer afford to discharge them and increasingly failed to send them to the one place they might be able to get help. Medical professionals within the military were aware of this huge problem, even though the military continued to look the other way. "It's clear that we've got a lot of significant alcohol problems that are pervasive across the military," said Dr. Thomas R. Kosten, a psychiatrist at the Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Houston. "The treatment that they take for [combat stress] is the same treatment that they took after Vietnam . . . They turn to alcohol and drugs."[5] The increasing number of "moral waivers" provided to recruits for previous alcohol and drug offenses made the problem even more serious.

Through 2005 and 2006, when the need was at its greatest, military spending on programs to reduce alcohol abuse, alongside a few other addictions like smoking, dropped from $12.6 million to $7.74 million.[6] A staggering 39 percent decline. It was this dereliction of duty to serving men and women that aroused the interest of Senator Clair McCaskill (D-MO), one of the few lawmakers to pick up on the issue and bang heads. In 2007 she wrote a letter to General Peter Chiarelli, senior military assistant to the Secretary of State, asking him to investigate allegations that a tranche of 150 soldiers at Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri, were not able to get the counseling they needed and wanted because of staff shortages at the base. McCaskill didn't mince her words, saying the base's program had been "in a shambles" for years, before adding, "If it was that bad at Fort Leonard Wood, it very well could be an Army-wide problem."[7] Her hunch was right, and the army-wide problem was causing untold suffering for the service members fighting in the Middle East and around the world. "How is it that a program can so deteriorate at a time when drug use and alcohol abuse is known to be closely tied to PTSD, suicides, criminal behavior, divorce and domestic abuse, all of which have substantially increased in recent years in the Army?" McCaskill asked the general.[8] But it was two years—during the War on Terror not a shabby response time for a generally unresponsive military—before General Chiarelli eventually acted, sending a memo to army leaders in 2009 lamenting the lack of discharges as regulation permitted, before pressing commanders to address the shortage of qualified counselors to help the soldiers through their addictions. "Our soldiers need this resource and I expect you to provide it for them," he instructed. Until then the best the army could point to was the relatively puny growth of its Substance Abuse Program, the budget for which grew from $38 million to $51 million between 2004 and 2008.[9] It was peanuts.

Back home, alcohol use among the general US population was increasing as well, hitting 67 percent of citizens in 2010, its highest since 1985, according to a Gallup poll, with an increasing number of states allowing Sunday liquor sales and moving sales start-time to 6 a.m. It was even worse within the military. The Pentagon's own health study found that binge drinking surged by 30 percent from 2002 to 2005, prompting the conclusion that it "may signal an increasing pattern of heavy alcohol use in the Army."[10] More than a quarter of army servicemen said they often drank heavily, which was defined as five or more drinks in one session. It constituted the largest proportion of the military since (again) 1985.[11] One academic study in March 2009 found that of the 16,037 active-duty personnel surveyed, 43 percent reported binge drinking in the previous month, a rate very similar to that of college students.[12] One of the biggest problems for the military was the same as in Vietnam: easy access. In Iraq it was easy to get your hands on what the troops call "hajji juice" or "hajji hooch," the locally produced 90 percent proof whiskey that the soldiers who participated in the Mahmudiyah massacre were supping before embarking on their crimes. This is sometimes combined with amphetamines provided by medical staff to keep troops alert on missions. In Iraq, despite the pro forma ban, soldiers would squeeze ampoules of food coloring into bottles of clear liquor and transfer it to bottles of mouthwash. Army medics, in a mild dereliction of duty, had been known to fill IV bags with vodka in lieu of saline solution. By 2010, the US military itself was spending $602,189.90 per year on alcoholic beverages.[13]

Partying It Up

In a warzone, a culture of binge drinking is dangerous for the same obvious reason that drunk driving is dangerous: drunk people aren't in full control of what they are doing. As the UK Daily Mail reported in March 2007, "Figures forced from the Pentagon by the New York Times under the Freedom of Information Act make shocking reading: 240 of the 665 cases of military indiscipline in Iraq and Afghanistan involved drugs and alcohol. Seventy-three of those 240 cases were the most serious yet known from these two wars: murder, rape, robbery and assault."[14] Many of these cases were fatal for Iraqis and US service members. In May 2004, as Bush was infamously pronouncing mission accomplished in Iraq, Private Justin Lissis went on the rampage with a stolen Humvee and his M-16 rifle in a residential district in Balad after getting drunk on whiskey smuggled into the base by Iraqi contractors.[15] Just six months on, Private Chris Rolan of the Third Brigade was having a heated argument with a fellow US soldier after a heady cocktail of alcohol and ended up shooting him with his 9mm pistol.[16] And it wasn't just Iraq. In 2006, one of the many errant airstrikes carried out by NATO in Afghanistan killed seventy civilians after the strike had been called in on Germany's instructions but carried out by American pilots. When staff at NATO's Kabul headquarters were to be questioned on the event the command found that they could not be interviewed because they were "either drunk or too hungover."[17] General Stanley McChrystal subsequently banned alcohol at the base, laying into the forces for "partying it up" when it emerged that there was a serious scene there. He said they did not have "their heads in the right place" after the attack.[18] It's hard to know what is more worrying: that the strike may have been called in by people either hungover or drunk, or that they decided to go on a binge after taking out seventy civilians. Binge drinkers, one academic study worryingly found, "report being drunk while working and being called to work during off-duty hours and reporting to work drunk."[19] The idea they may have been drunk was implied when a spokesperson said: "General McChrystal is extremely focused on the mission and he feels that the folk who are here at the headquarters level need to be at the top of their game in terms of supporting the folks out in the field." One insider was more explicit. "Thursday nights are the big party nights, because Friday's a 'low-ops' day. They even open a bar in the garden at headquarters," they said. "There's a 'two can' rule but people ignore it and hit it pretty hard."

This was now starting to endanger even the safety of America's own diplomats as well, as allegations of drunken brawls and lewd behavior at the US embassy in Kabul led to another drink ban being imposed. An independent group sent a ten-page dossier to Secretary of State Clinton containing evidence that security guards at the embassy had been having "drunken parties involving prostitutes" and forms of "ritual humiliation associated with gang initiation".[20] The dossier included an email from a guard serving in Kabul describing guards and supervisors "peeing on people, eating potato chips out of [buttock] cracks, vodka shots out of [buttock] cracks (there is video of that one), broken doors after drnken [sic] brawls, threats and intimidation from those leaders participating in this activity."[21] In Tokyo, the US navy imposed a movement and alcohol ban after a Japanese taxi driver was found dead with a twenty-centimeter kitchen knife blade stuck in his neck in Yokosuka, just south of Tokyo, where the US has a naval base.[22] The culprit, Olatunbosun Ugbogu, was a Nigerian national and US sailor, one of the many foreign citizens enfranchised to fight by the War on Terror. Even animals weren't safe. Over at Baghdad Zoo, a drunk soldier shot and killed a Bengal tiger on one of the Thursday binge nights. "The soldiers arrived in the evening with food and beer, accompanied by a group of Iraqi police officers," head of the zoo, Adel Salman Musa, said of the incident. "One of the soldiers, who the Iraqi police said had drunk a lot, went into the cage against the advice of his colleagues and tried to feed the animal who severely hurt his arm," he added. The tiger, said the news agency, tore off the soldier's fingers and mauled his arm and another US soldier immediately fired at the animal and killed it. "The soldiers don't have the right to behave like that. That was the most precious and valuable animal in the whole zoo. It was fourteen years old and had been born here," Musa said.[23]

In a Birthday Cake

The problem with illicit drug use was even worse in US-occupied Afghanistan, the country with the biggest poppy harvests in the world, producing 9,000 metric tonnes of opium each year, which is chemically treated to make heroin. Production had not slowed down substantially during the occupation, and soldiers found they could buy heroin quicker than they could buy a bottle of water. There were even rumors that the US was not getting a handle on the drug production because it was too lucrative. General Mahmut Gareev, a former commander during the Soviet Union's war in Afghanistan, alleged that the US was paying for its occupation through the harvests, which could yield up to $50 billion a year.[24] Whatever the reason, US service members using heroin frequently went unpunished by the military. "They don't do anything to you," one soldier said. "Two from my unit were sent home after they got caught more than once." Asked what was done to them, he replied, "Nothing. They're still in the unit. Just got sent home."[25] It was so rife that a top military commander said he would be surprised if the army had not turned into a drug-dealing cartel. "I'd be astonished if we don't see soldiers who find ten kilograms of heroin and pack it up in a birthday cake and send it home to their mother," said General Barry McCaffrey, a former "drug czar" under President Clinton.[26]

Experts think it could be a decade before the true scope of heroin use in Iraq and Afghanistan is known. Dr. Jodie Trafton, a health-care specialist with the VA's Center for Health Care Evaluation, predicted that the scale of the problem will not be gaugeable until five or ten years after the wars are over and veterans enter the system in significant numbers. "We're just starting to get a lot of Gulf War veterans," she said. But the signs were definitely there. "I asked to buy heroin a dozen times during two trips a year apart and never heard the word 'no,'" said a filmmaker who had been to Afghanistan on numerous occasions. "I also saw ample evidence that soldiers were trading sensitive military equipment, like computer drives and bulletproof vests, for drugs."[27] The results were appalling for the many soldiers whose lives were ripped apart by addiction. The Veterans Health Administration counted over 3,000 veterans of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars as diagnosed with potential drug dependency from 2005 to 2007. This was a monumental rise on previous years. From 2002 through 2004 only 277 veterans were diagnosed with a drug dependency.[28] "It's a huge concern, it's a national concern," Lynn Pahland, a director in the Pentagon's Health Affairs office, said. "Any kind of drug use or health choice that leads to the impairment of a military person leads to the degradation of readiness."[29]

But the operational readiness of the force was strangely down at the bottom of the list of priorities. Veterans For America (VFA) member Jason Knobloch wrote, "Numerous studies have shown, as VFA has found over and over again, that heavy drinking and drug use are often attempts to self-medicate untreated psychological problems such as post-traumatic stress disorder. The programs to treat these conditions of both the military and the Veterans Administration are understaffed and underfunded."[30] In fact, the military was making it worse. The number of soldiers seeking help for substance abuse had climbed 25 percent in five years, according to USA Today, but the army's counseling program remained "significantly understaffed and struggling to meet the demand."[31] The army requires one drug counselor for every 2,000 soldiers, yet in late 2008 it was operating with one for every 3,100 soldiers.[32] It didn't come close to catering to the needs of the service members, many of whom were suffering from a variety of mental health problems and finding no help for them within official channels.

Guinea Pigs

It wasn't just that the military was ignoring the use of alcohol and drugs—in many cases it was promoting it. The streamlined, flexible, and understaffed US military that was Rumsfeld's dream meant that extra energy and service time had to be squeezed out of existing troops. To do this some were plied with cocktails of narcotics and stimulants. "The capability to resist the mental and physiological effects of sleep deprivation will fundamentally change current military concepts of 'operational tempo' and contemporary orders of battle for the military services," states a document from the Pentagon's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or DARPA. "In short, the capability to operate effectively, without sleep, is no less than a twenty-first-century revolution in military affairs that results in operational dominance across the whole range of potential U.S. military employments."[33] To achieve this operational dominance, amphetamines of all kinds were provided to the US air force—in street parlance, speed. The drug is traditionally used to treat narcolepsy or attention deficit disorder, but for the military's purposes it was perfect: it increased concentration, energy levels, and adrenalin. But there were psychological drawbacks, which appeared especially relevant to those using bomb-laden aircraft. According to Wired magazine, "serious potential side effects include psychotic behavior, depression, anxiety, fatigue, paranoia, aggression, violent behavior, confusion, insomnia, auditory hallucinations, mood disturbances and delusions."[34] The operational effect of this new "revolution" revealed itself early on in the Afghanistan war effort when in April 2002 a US aircraft dropped a 500-pound bomb on a group of Canadian soldiers at Tarnak Farms near Kandahar, Afghanistan, killing four and leaving eight injured. In the resulting investigations the two pilots claimed the air force's policy of handing out dextro-amphetamine, or Dexedrine, was responsible for the error, not them.[35]

Back at base, willing soldiers were welcome to another load of drugs to help them deal with the hell of war. As PTSD developed into a chronic problem, pills took the place of doctors in dealing with the mental health crisis among US troops. One soldier recounts going to talk to a military doctor about the trauma he was suffering as a result of the conflict. "Here's some medication," he was told, before being prescribed a cocktail of drugs: "Klonopin, for anxiety; Zoloft, for depression; and Ambien, to help him sleep."[36] Data from a mental health survey by the US army found that 12 percent of soldiers in Iraq and 15 percent in Afghanistan were taking some form of anti-depressant, anti-anxiety drug, or sleeping pill.[37] The army itself was more than happy to dispense them: it was much cheaper than increasing the number of medical professionals. By September 2007 prescriptions for narcotics for active-duty troops had reached 50,000 a month, up from 33,000 a month in October 2003.[38] In the midst of all this, it came as no surprise that an extensive drug smuggling network involving US soldiers was gradually developed. In 2008, a drug ring suspected of providing steroids to US service members in Iraq was busted in northern Italy. According to ABC News, briefed by government officials, "Dozens of active and former soldiers have abused their military uniforms and authority in a drug smuggling ring."[39] Their list included:

> A U.S. army sergeant fighting the war on drugs in Colombia was recently sentenced to six years in prison for using military aircraft to smuggle cocaine into the United States. In April, an Air National Guard pilot and a sergeant used a C-5 Galaxy military transport plane to sneak nearly 300,000 Ecstasy pills from Germany into New York. In another case, three U.S. airmen were arrested in March for stealing military-issue bulletproof vests from Moody Air Force Base in Georgia and selling them to drug dealers for $100 each.[40]

It wasn't just rogue soldiers procuring ecstasy either. The military was in on it as well. In 2005 it moved to start prescribing the rave drug better known in the clubs and discos of big American cities to its soldiers. The scientists trailing the drug were said to be interested in the "emotional closeness" it creates among its users.[41] Two years later, the move to medicate PTSD away led to the so-called Psychological Kevlar Act, which was meant to formalize a program of research to help soldiers tackle the problem early on. Its stated purpose was to "implement a plan to incorporate preventive and early-intervention measures" to combat "post-traumatic stress disorder or other stress-related psychopathologies."[42] A drug called propranolol was the talk of the town at the time because if taken directly after a traumatic event it could apparently blunt the force of the experience on the brain. The brave new world was here. The Department of Veterans Affairs conducted its own tests on the drug's effect on PTSD symptom reduction and found that a single oral dose, compared to a placebo, immediately after reactivation of the PTSD-related memory of the traumatic event "significantly reduced physiological responses."[43]

It was all a bonanza for Big Pharma, which raked in billions of dollars of taxpayer money: in 2007 alone the DOD spent $3 billion on contracts for its ballooning pharmaceutical needs. The powerful Big Pharma lobby in turn pushed the military to continue drugging their soldiers and the military brass didn't demur: the pharmaceutical industry was becoming a full-fledged part of the military-industrial complex. It was a natural progression since their lobbying had already worked in wider society. In the general population over the previous decade, the number of Americans taking one or more prescription drugs had risen from 44 to 48 percent, while one 2009 drug-abuse survey found that 2.8 percent of the US population used prescription drugs in non-medical ways—up from 2.5 percent the year previous. The next front for the lobby was service members. "Armed with potent drugs and new technology, a dangerous breed of soldiers are being trained to fight America's future wars," warned one magazine at the time.[44] Soldiers were to be the guinea pigs for a burgeoning field of research. "Improved drug delivery systems and improved neurological understanding could make today's drugs seem rudimentary, giving soldiers a superhuman strength and awareness," wrote Wired magazine.[45] A report released by the intelligence unit of the DOD in 2008 contained a multitude of suggestions on how to manipulate the minds of soldiers using new research on brain functions. Perhaps the most sci-fi element of the report was its description of so-called "pharmacological landmines," using chemicals to incapacitate the enemy. But amazingly it wasn't the enemy that was being plied with dodgy drugs during the War on Terror, but US troops themselves. In 2008 an ABC News and Washington Times investigation revealed that the VA was testing the anti-smoking drug Chantix on veterans who knew nothing about its side effects until three months in.[46] The side effects were not innocuous either, including as they did psychosis and potential suicide. "Lab rat, guinea pig, disposable hero," said former US army sniper James Elliott when asked how he felt.

Even the military had gone too far this time, and they duly incurred the wrath of then presidential candidate Barack Obama who came out to denounce the testing. "It is outrageous and unacceptable that our government would irresponsibly endanger veterans who have already sacrificed so much for our country," he said. "Our veterans—particularly those suffering from mental health injuries—should have the very best health care and support in the world, they should never be needlessly exposed to drugs without proper notification of the dangers involved or effective monitoring of the side effects."[47] Obama was right that veterans deserved access to the best health care, but they would never receive it. Even back in the US—where much of the alcoholism and drug abuse played out in the most traumatic way among the families of veterans and those in their community—the military looked the other way. "We better be ready to offer compassion and treatment—not just a jail cell—when it comes to helping our brothers and sisters heal from the damages of war," said Tony Newman, communications director at the Drug Policy Alliance. "Let's hope that we support our current troops better than we supported the veterans who fought in Vietnam."[48] But they weren't treated any better—and only a brave few spoke out. "The war is now and the problems are now," said Richard A. McCormick, a senior scholar for public health at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, who served on a Pentagon task force.[49] "Every day there is a cohort of men and women being discharged who need services not one or two or five years from now. They need them now." While the military dithered on how to deal with an impending crisis, drug use was endemic. "Lots of soldiers coming back from Iraq have been using drugs," Specialist William Swenson, who was deployed to Iraq, told ABC News. "Right when we got back there were people using cocaine in the barracks, there were people smoking marijuana at strip clubs; one guy started shooting up."[50] The VA soon had the dubious distinction of being the world's largest provider of substance-abuse services, looking after 350,000 veterans per year, of which 30,000 needed treatment for opiate addiction.[51]

It wasn't helping the domestic US criminal justice system either, with troubled veterans spilling into the country's jails at unprecedented levels. "A small fraction wind up in prison for homicides or other major crimes. Far more, though, are involved in drunken bar fights, reckless driving and alcohol-fueled domestic violence. Whatever the particulars, their stories often spool out in unwitting victims, ruptured families, lost jobs and crushing debt,"[52] wrote the New York Times. The army claimed it was doing all it could, of course. That was its default position. "The Army takes alcohol and drug abuse very seriously and has tried for decades to deglamorize its use," said a spokesman.[53] "With the urgency of this war, we continue to tackle the problem with education, prevention and treatment." How seriously did it take the problem? In 2010 it put $2 million into starting up its "That Guy" website, which aimed to stop binge-drinking among veterans because it detracts from the "things they care about: family, friends, dating, sex, money and reputation."[54] It was completely inadequate: a single stitch to rescue an unraveling group of soldiers. By 2008 it was clear the situation was now a full-blown crisis destroying the emotional and psychological wellbeing of US service members across the board. A Pentagon investigation found that the psychological problems among troops were "daunting and growing" and betrayed a "fundamental weaknesses" in the military's approach. In reality it was out of control: nearly 40 percent of soldiers, half of all National Guard, and a third of Marines were reporting serious mental health issues.[55] Many were committing suicide.

COLLATERAL DAMAGE COMES HOME

> I was in no condition to leave. I'm an infantryman. If I'm screwed up in my head, it could cost my life or the lives of the men with me.
>
> Michael De Vlieger, gunner with the 101st Airborne in Iraq, 2009[56]

In July 2007, Army Specialist Travis Virgadamo returned home on a "rest and relaxation" break to the serene mountain surroundings of Pahrump, Nevada, after an arduous tour of Iraq as violence in the country peaked. It was immediately obvious to his family and friends that he was in a bad way and had dipped into a severe depression while out in the desert. Back in the US he kept telling his grandmother about the horrendous things he had seen: images so distressing that he thought he could never go back. But in the military, refusing to go back into service can land you a prison sentence. Even so, Travis was thinking of going AWOL and fleeing to Canada, as many had done during the Vietnam War. His grandmother was more cautious and counseled him against it, advising that he tell the army to stop feeding him Prozac. "I told Travis when he was going back to Iraq in July to make sure to tell his doctor and chaplain that he wanted to go off," his grandmother said. "I had read that sometimes it had caused the opposite effect on young people. Instead of being an antidepressant, it caused them to commit suicide."[57] Travis simply told her, "Grandma, I did that, and they put me on something else. They changed my medicine, gave me a week of stress management."[58] There was no sympathy from the military: weeks later, with his leave time up, Travis was sent back to Iraq along with his Prozac. But his superiors obviously knew something was wrong as they placed him on suicide watch and removed the bolt from his rifle, rendering it useless. He was given more pedestrian desk jobs as he tried to sort out his head. If they had to send him back, it appeared a good course of action. But, inexplicably, Virgadamo was cleared for combat the following month, and on the night of August 30, 2007, was given his rifle bolt back. Three hours later he walked out of his barracks and shot himself in the head. The army told his family he had died from a "self-inflicted" gunshot wound, avoiding the word "suicide," now a dirty word for them. "I don't think he should have ever been sent there," his grandmother said in the aftermath. "Why would you deploy someone who was a danger to himself and maybe others? When they know, it's just unacceptable, pushing them out there."[59] In fact, Travis's whole time in the military had been extremely dangerous. Even though he had always wanted to be a soldier, it was in an emotional period after his father moved to the Philippines that he eventually decided to enlist. He was just seventeen years old. "He had a difficult time in boot camp," said his grandmother. "They sent him to anger-management classes. Feeling somewhat deserted by his father—he was so young." She added, "They had also put him in suicide watch in boot camp."[60]

Despite these serious signs of frailty, a year later Virgadamo was deployed to Iraq, with the Prozac he had been given by the military. The military belief in medicating away mental strife had many tragic consequences similar to that experienced by Travis. "Even though he was still on active duty (placing him under DOD jurisdiction), this incident only reinforces the fact that we need to place more emphasis on the mental health of service members in or returning from combat," said Shelley Berkley, a Representative in Congress from the State of Nevada, his home state.[61] The whole thing had uncomfortable echoes of Vietnam, where soldiers helped themselves to psychotropic drugs, while psychologists were singing the virtues of a myriad of different brain drugs to help troops concentrate, boost their energy, and ostensibly dull mental health problems. Medical opinion was, however, unambiguous about the dangers of pumping drugs into unstable soldiers: "There are risks in putting people back to battle with medicines in their bodies," said psychiatrist Judith Broder, founder of the Soldiers Project. Travis's grandmother agreed. "That is a suicidal medicine, especially with teens. I was livid. I just couldn't believe they put him on Prozac," she said.[62]

Unfriendly Fire

As medication became the primary and often only treatment for the psychological problems suffered by soldiers, more suicides followed. The Pentagon reported that in 2007, 115 US troops committed suicide: the highest toll since the military had tracked such figures.[63] The military rate was thirty times higher than for the general US population and it was getting worse year-by-year: by 2009 the number of suicide victims had reached 245. In June 2010 alone, 32 soldiers killed themselves, the highest number of military suicides in one month since the Vietnam era. Of those, 21 were on active duty, seven serving in Iraq or Afghanistan.[64] It was even worse for those who had been discharged. Three times as many young California veterans were killing themselves at home than California service members were dying in Iraq and Afghanistan combined. The Pentagon and VA don't count the dead after they come home, but an examination of coroners' reports showed that more than 1,000 veterans under thirty-five died in California between 2005 and 2008.[65] Despite these horrifying statistics, it took until 2009 before the mental health problems afflicting US troops were revealed to mainstream America by the military. In that year, an army report from Fort Carson was initiated after six 4th Brigade Team soldiers had been charged with murders on their return home from the Middle East. The substance abuse among some troops, pre-existing mental illness in recruits, and the failure of the army to provide help were major factors in the violence —a spate of crime that included the rape and murder of a nineteen-year-old girl and one soldier's murder of his child. All in Colorado, all in six months.

“Those three [factors] in combination are a really toxic mix,” said Lieutenant General Eric Schoomaker, Army Surgeon General.[66]

Soldiers involved in crimes related to homicide at Fort Carson were, the report said, “at risk for engaging in violent behavior based on a clustering of known risk factors for violence, namely prior criminal behavior and psychopathology,” possibly with the “moral waivers” in mind. The investigation suggested a possible association between increasing levels of combat exposure and risk of violent outcomes. The Fort Carson report found that eleven of the suspects had been identified with drug or alcohol problems but only half of them had been sent for treatment, as army regulation stipulates they should have been. The army was immediately on the back foot, reverting to their standard evasion tactic, countering that there was no direct link between combat and crime, and reminding a news conference that in the vast majority of cases veterans don’t commit crimes—a true but irrelevant point in the context of the shocking report. Major General Mark Graham, Fort Carson’s commander, added that the report had resulted in more counseling and mental health training for returning soldiers. He also said the base was “stepping up efforts to ensure that soldiers who test positive for drug use or exhibit signs of problem drinking will get substance abuse counseling and treatment.”[67] But it was a smoke-and-mirrors exercise to appease the media and lawmakers who were getting increasingly vocal. “The Army’s support for our service men and women is falling short and we need to do better,” Senator Michael Bennet (D-CO) said after the report was released. “This situation is unacceptable for our troops, untenable for military families and communities, and incompatible with our priorities as a nation.”[68]

Away from its public promises, the military had been doing the opposite and knowingly sending mentally ill soldiers back into the warzone. In 2003, United Press International unearthed an Army Medical Department after-action report which admitted that “variability in predeployment screening guidelines for mental health issues may have resulted in some soldiers with mental health diagnoses being inappropriately deployed”—those like Travis Virgadamo. The public impression was “that some soldiers develop problems in theater,” it added, when in truth, “in some cases, they actually have pre-existing conditions.”[69] The report was adamant that the army must change its practices or risk sending soldiers back into combat who had serious mental health problems. “Perhaps stricter predeployment screening is required to keep at-risk soldiers from deploying," it said; a move which could help "identifying soldiers that may become non-functional in theater due to mental health problems."[70] Pentagon policy is that members of the military must be mentally stable for at least three months before being deployed for active duty, but it wasn't being applied. The problem was amplified further by the longer and more-frequent tours of duty in the Middle East under the so-called "stop-loss" system—which describes the involuntary lengthening of tours. In 2007, the military had said its active-duty units would now serve in fifteen-month tours instead of the regular twelve months—a big demand. The prolonged periods away from family, friends, and normal life aggravated stress and anxiety. "This policy is a difficult but necessary interim step," said Secretary of Defense Robert Gates at the time.[71] "Our forces are stretched, there's no question about that." Broken would have been a better choice of word.

For those under occupation by the US military it was even more dangerous. In March 2012, a US soldier, on his fourth deployment in a decade, walked out of his base and went on a shooting spree in southern Afghanistan, murdering more than a dozen Afghan civilians, including nine children. "This is an assassination, an intentional killing of innocent civilians and cannot be forgiven," said Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan, in the aftermath. It was the latest in a long line of repeated demands by Karzai for the US to put an end to the wanton murder of civilians. Then news came that US army staff sergeant Robert Bales, the thirty-eight-year-old suspect, was from Joint Base Lewis-McCord, in Washington state, which just four months earlier had convicted a member of an Afghanistan "kill team" of murder via a military jury. Senator Patty Murray just the week before had been complaining about the military hospital overturning 285 diagnoses of PTSD.[72] "I heard something on Facebook about a soldier killing civilians," a corporal with the Fourth Stryker Brigade told the New York Times. "It's horrible, but I guess I've almost become numb to it."

PTSD was not a new phenomenon for the military, but sending soldiers still suffering from severe mental health problems back to the frontline in such large numbers was. "I'm concerned that people who are symptomatic are being sent back. That has not happened before in our country," complained Dr. Arthur S. Blank, Jr., a Yale-trained psychiatrist.[73] Senator Barbara Boxer (D-CA) helped create a Task Force on Mental Health in the DOD as the situation spiraled out of control. She mentioned "reports that doctors are being encouraged not to identify mental-health illness in our troops . . . I am asking for a lot of answers," she added. "If people are suffering from mental-health problems, they should not be sent on the battlefield."[74] The army's top mental health expert, Colonel Elspeth Ritchie, explicitly accepted that the reason so many mentally ill troops were being sent back was because of the demands on the military for more and more personnel. "The challenge for us," he said, "is that the Army has a mission to fight. And, as you know, recruiting has been a challenge. And so we have to weigh the needs of the mission, with the soldiers' personal needs."[75] In August of 2009, the US army announced a new $117 million program designed to expose its soldiers to "emotional resiliency" classes. The program aimed for so-called "Comprehensive Soldier Fitness," which, according to an army spokesman, was designed "to build resilience in soldiers, family members, and Army civilians by developing five dimensions of strength: physical, emotional, social, spiritual, and family."[76]

A rash of suicides was not the only worry; soldiers with mental health problems were more in danger than their healthy counterparts during combat, according to a US navy report from the Vietnam era. It had found that marines who'd been hospitalized between 1965 and 1972 for psychiatric reasons and then sent back into battle were more likely to be injured in combat.[77] And there were plenty of tragic examples to bear out this study during the War on Terror, such as Travis Virgadamo. Another was Michael De Vlieger, who went to Iraq in early 2006 as a gunner with the 101st Airborne. Soon after his arrival nine soldiers were killed when two Humvees in his platoon were blown up by a roadside bomb. Just a month later insurgents threw an antitank grenade under his Humvee and his knee shot through the door. He was sent to coalesce at Fort Kentucky but his personality had changed. He turned to drink and attacked his wife's dog. "I had lost so many friends and went through a near-death experience. I wasn't who I was when I left," he said. According to one report:

> He was updating his will and preparing to return to Iraq when he broke down. His wife, Christine, found him awake in the middle of the night, rocking while babbling incoherently. Frightened, Christine called his squad leader, who took him to the base emergency room. Doctors then sent him to a nearby private psychiatric hospital, where he stayed for 16 days, receiving medications to calm his panic and treat his blood pressure and depression. The doctors released him with four prescriptions.

But merely eighteen hours after his release from hospital, he was on a plane destined for Iraq after being told by a non-commissioned officer that he was needed back there. Decisions on whether to retain soldiers are taken by military commanders instead of qualified medical professionals, which puts the occupied populations at the mercy of thousands of unstable soldiers. De Vlieger later said, "I was in no condition to leave. I'm an infantryman. If I'm screwed up in my head, it could cost my life or the lives of the men with me." But he did manage to stay alive. A lot of troops suffering mental health problems and sent back into the firefight weren't so lucky. Private First Class Jason Scheuerman was stripped of his gun when he wrote his mother a suicide note from Iraq in 2005. He was later accused of inventing his mental health problems in an effort to be discharged and was warned that he could be disciplined. Three weeks later he was dead, after shooting himself in the head with the gun the army had returned to him. Needless to say, it is unknown how many Iraqi and Afghan civilians have been sacrificed to this policy.

Bradley Manning, the alleged US military source of the Wikileaks data, was another example of the mental health of recruits being ignored. He was in such a disturbed mental state before his deployment that he wet himself, threw furniture around, shouted at his commanding officer, and underwent regular psychiatric evaluations, according to the Guardian. Manning was a "mess of a child" who "should never have been put through a tour of duty in Iraq," said an officer from the Fort Leonard Wood military base in Missouri, where Manning trained in 2007.[78] He was sent anyway—a decision which came back to bite the US military. Chase Madar, the author of a recent book on Manning, told me, "He would never have been kept in the army if not for record-low recruitment levels in 2007 when he enlisted. Manning spent a few weeks in the 'reject barracks' at Fort Leonard Wood where he did basic training and that sounds like absolute hell, being confined with tons of criminals and young guys not right in the head." The only reason Manning made it on to active duty in Iraq, after repeated warnings about his fitness at all three of his stateside deployments (Fort Leonard Wood, Fort Huachuca, Fort Drum), was the army's "utter desperation for soldiers with IT and analytic skills during its historic low in recruitment." A portion of the chatlogs between Manning and Adrian Lamo, the hacker informant who turned him in, notes how the military, desperate for recruits, ran only minimal background checks on him. There is no mention of how he almost got discharged right away at basic training, which is no doubt a painful memory he'd rather not bring up:

> (12:06:18 PM) info@adrianlamo.com: how did this not come up as an issue in your background check? I'm guessing you have an S and not a TS.
>
> (12:06:29 PM) bradass87: TS/SCI
>
> (12:06:47 PM) bradass87: i enlisted in 2007 . . . height of iraq war, no-one double checked much
>
> (12:07:06 PM) info@adrianlamo.com: Well, hell, if you made it in, maybe I should reconsider the offer I got from what used to be JTF-CNO.
>
> (12:07:09 PM) bradass87: background checks are jokes anyway
>
> (12:07:23 PM) info@adrianlamo.com: It's hit-or-miss.[79]

The Support

Throughout the War on Terror money was consistently pulled from programs set up to put homecoming soldiers back on the straight and narrow. A Pentagon survey in 2007 found that 38 percent of soldiers who returned from combat said they had experienced psychological problems, from depression to anger, but the same report disclosed there had been "dramatic decreases" in the number of health care professionals assigned to the military since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq had begun.[80] With billions of dollars being expended on quashing the insurgencies the report concluded that the US military "currently lacks both funding and personnel to adequately support the psychological health of service members and their families."[81] At the time of the report's publication there were only 500 mental health professionals employed in an army of more than a million soldiers.

It was clear that caring for veterans was just too expensive for the Bush administration. In 2005, only two years into the war in Iraq, Bush was widely condemned for his budget for veterans' health care, which fell well short of maintaining the levels of the years before, bearing in mind the huge numbers of new soldiers returning from war.[82] In that year not only did Bush try to double the co-payment that veterans would pay for prescription drugs, but he also proposed a new flat $250 fee for some veterans to use the health care system. Even Senator Daniel K. Akaka (D-HI) warned at the time that this could force 192,000 veterans out of the health care system because of the price hike. Later in 2005 it was revealed that the Bush administration had left a $1 billion shortage for veterans' health care that had to be plugged by emergency supplemental funds voted for by Congress again.[83] In 2006, with discretionary spending apparently needing to be cut to deal with the massive deficit, the White House predicted a 16 percent cut in veterans' health care, despite the increasing numbers of veterans needing the services.[84] In that budget year Congress had to add another $2.7 billion emergency funding to the VA on top of Bush's budget.

The effect of turning veterans' health care from an absolute necessity, among the most important of government responsibilities, into an expendable commitment had painful consequences for those returning from combat. Ever-increasing numbers of soldiers were returning with mental health problems ranging from schizophrenia to PTSD, and one academic study estimated that in 2004, 1.8 million veterans were without health insurance, which amounts to about 12 percent of all uninsured people in the US.[85] From 2000, Bush's first year in office, to 2004, two years into his War on Terror, the number of uninsured veterans grew by 290,000.[86] Conditions were deteriorating for the medics as well: the air force lost 20 percent of its mental health workers from 2003 to 2005 while the army lost 8 percent in the same period.[87] By 2008, the Bush administration was even employing lawyers to fight a case that had been brought to insist that mental health should be included in health care provisions for veterans.[88] Unsurprisingly, Bush didn't mention this when speaking on Veterans Day in November 2008: "I am committed to making sure that today's veterans get all the health care and support they need from the federal government for agreeing to serve in a time of danger," he said just before he left office with the most squalid of records on the topic.[89] John McCain's plan was even worse than Bush's: he wanted to privatize veterans' health care, turning it into a market-oriented trust, which would have been devastated by the financial crisis. The Republicans' claim to be the party of the military (which they used to regularly beat the Democrats) was nothing but a sham from start to finish. To be fair, there was little improvement under the Obama administration as the president came under pressure in 2011 to ensure that veterans' benefits were delivered amid mounting criticism from different groups. During a Congressional hearing, Patty Murray, chairwoman of the Senate Veterans Affairs committee, chided the VA for reducing the number of eligible participants for a new benefit for critically injured veterans and their caregivers, and was deeply critical of the severe delays to the start of the program. "Families of wounded warriors are waiting for these benefits, and with each day of delay the strain from the sacrifices they make only grows," she said.[90]

Easy Picking

The best investigation into the problem was conducted at the height of the War on Terror by the Connecticut newspaper The Hartford Courant, but it had little impact as its revelations were largely ignored by the military. It opened with the story of Specialist Edward W. Brabazon, or "Crazy Eddie," of the 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment at Fort Bragg in North Carolina. "We were surprised they took him, with the kind of mental problems he had, but we figured the Army must know what they're doing," said his mother, Margaret. "We didn't think they'd send him into combat."[91] But send him they did, and less than three months into his second deployment, Brabazon shot himself in the head at a palace compound in Baghdad. "They talked about how he had a history of mental problems," Margaret said. "I said, 'No kidding. If you knew he had mental problems, then why was he there?'" The Courant concluded: "Despite a Congressional mandate to assess the mental health of every soldier sent to a combat zone," there was "a fractured pre-deployment screening process in which less than 1 percent of deploying soldiers ever see a mental health professional. It is a practice that has put unfit service members in harm's way, increasing their risk for suicide and post-traumatic stress disorder." Its analysis of data from the DOD found that one third of soldiers who killed themselves in Iraq did so within three months of being deemed mentally fit and sent into combat. Experts said that the vast majority of those who take their own lives are suffering from depression or bipolar disorder at the time, adding "it is doubtful soldiers would spontaneously develop a serious mental illness so quickly after deployment." But the required treatment was no longer available, and, even if diagnosed, soldiers would find themselves put back in harm's way with their minds still traumatized. In fact, the military was also actively working to send soldiers back because it was too expensive to treat them. A stunning investigation in the online magazine Salon revealed the lengths to which the military was prepared to go in order to stop medical staff diagnosing PTSD, on the grounds that the intensive care needed after such a diagnosis would be too pricey. It showed how a veteran from Iraq named only as "Sergeant X," who had been seeking treatment at Fort Carson for a brain injury and PTSD for more than a year, was misdiagnosed by military psychologist Douglas McNinch with an "anxiety disorder," not PTSD. The report outlined the case:

> Sgt. X believed his traumatic brain injury had been incurred in 2005–6 when his Bradley Fighting Vehicle buckled in an explosion in Iraq. While one of many he endured, this one knocked him out for 30 seconds. Mr McNinch told Sgt. X: "I will tell you something confidentially that I would have to deny if it were ever public. Not only myself, but all the clinicians up here are being pressured to not diagnose PTSD and diagnose [an unspecified] anxiety disorder [instead]." "Unfortunately," McNinch told Sgt. X, "yours has not been the only case . . . I and other [doctors] are under a lot of pressure to not diagnose PTSD. It's not fair. I think it's a horrible way to treat soldiers, but unfortunately, you know, now the V.A. is jumping on board, saying, 'Well, these people don't have PTSD,' and stuff like that." But this wasn't an isolated case. Two veterans groups had released an email from Norma Perez, a psychologist in Texas, directing staff at a Department of Veterans Affairs facility. "Given that we are having more and more compensation seeking veterans, I'd like to suggest that you refrain from giving a diagnosis of PTSD straight out," Perez wrote in the e-mail, suggesting the staff "consider a diagnosis of Adjustment Disorder."[92]

Sergeant X was brave enough to seek help for his problems, but not everyone was. Many soldiers were too scared to come forward because of what the military described as "stigma" in a macho military environment. "Stigma and lack of referral to the Army Substance Referral Program for required substance abuse screening were important barriers to soldiers," noted the Fort Carson report.[93] But this concern among the troops was more a concern about how seeking help would be viewed by their commanders. A 2007 survey found that three in five American soldiers felt that seeking help would damage their career prospects, with around half saying that they thought others would think less of them if they received help for mental health problems.[94] That kind of feeling doesn't develop in a vacuum: the fear of revealing mental problems to medical staff had been consciously fostered by a military unprepared to treat its soldiers. One study found that one in five soldiers who returned from the desert reported the effects of PTSD, but only half went on to receive treatment.

In a farcical public relations blitz, a delegation of Hollywood celebrities was dispatched to Baghdad in 2008 to tell the troops it was OK to feel mentally sick. The Stop the Stigma tour was organized by Sopranos star Joe Pantoliano, who had already founded the "No Kidding, Me Too!" group to break down taboos surrounding mental illness. As the group descended on Victory Base Complex, the troops were told by the psychologist accompanying the delegation that "the things that you experience, they are not military problems, they are human problems that happen to occur in the military . . . When you come home, educate us. We need to hear your stories." But the military knew their stories and was ignoring them. "I know the military is especially concerned; they've been willing to be very proactive and they obviously really care about their men and women, so it's an honor for us to be a part of this," added actress Lisa Jay, duped into believing the military propaganda.[95] To anyone watching the situation it was clear the military didn't care; it had stood by as the number of PTSD cases had risen exponentially. In 2008, the Rand Corporation released a report, based on surveys of veterans, estimating that of the 1.6 million American military personnel who had served in Afghanistan and Iraq, at least 300,000 were suffering from PTSD or major depression. Rand also estimated that as many as 320,000 may have suffered some form of brain damage from explosion blast waves, affecting their long-term cognitive capabilities.[96] The country at large was simply not ready to cope with this new influx. Back home, the number of Americans in the general population seeking treatment for mental health problems, including depression and bipolar disorder, had nearly doubled in the decade to 2006, from 19 million to 36 million. Spending on mental illnesses had skyrocketed in the same period, outstripping that for cancer and heart disease, reaching $58 billion in 2006.[97]

The Lifeline of Work and a Home

One of the toughest problems for veterans on their return to the US is finding a job, and frequent periods of unemployment are often a factor in the descent into depression and other problems. The unemployment rate for veterans hit 15 percent in 2011, nearly doubling over the previous five years, and leaving returning soldiers with much worse odds than the general population.[98] That the help available to unemployed veterans provided by the military was rudimentary became obvious to me when in 2007 I attended the third annual "Salute Our Heroes" veterans job fair in Manhattan, an initiative that aims to ease veterans' passage back into mainstream society after they retire from the military. An eclectic collection of organizations were in attendance, from financial companies to universities, all of which said they were on the lookout for prospective employees. William Offutt, the Special Assistant of the Veterans Employment and Training Service, told me: "The event is important because it is promoting and prioritizing a big section of the population that deserve recognition. When employers are looking for the best they need to be able to find it, and veterans constitute a highly skilled workforce." But it became clear that no one was actually offering any jobs. It was another public relations exercise. Sal Manze, sixty-six, was a Vietnam veteran and advertised the fact on his baseball cap as he sauntered around the floor of the hall. He fought for two years from 1965 to 1966. "They don't interview on the spot," he told me. "Most of the companies are just giving out information rather than offering jobs. I think if they were able to hire immediately it would be great, but as it is it's just frustrating." Now he was working a $7-an-hour seasonal job as a sales associate at Macy's. "They say age doesn't come into it but it's just not true," he said. "But how can you prove it? Go to the interview with a lawyer?" Others felt similarly. "I want to get into technology now," said Tyrone Webb, twenty-nine, and a veteran of nearly five years in the US navy. "I used to be an aviation engineer, working on the engines of aircraft. The problem is getting a job with a bad discharge from service is very difficult." Webb was given a dishonorable discharge after his mother contracted cancer and he became disheartened when he was not allowed to visit her and lost focus on the job. "I started being late and just not caring. I was discharged soon after and they gave me Reentry Code 4 on my [discharge form] and so it is impossible to get a job when it says 'other than honorable discharge' on my documents." Since he left the military in June 2006 he has worked mainly in retail sales and phone surveys, and is currently working in a restaurant. "I am angry," he said. "I have a lot on my plate, I think about children but I can't have any because of my situation, I can't even think about girlfriends."

It wasn't just the US military helping to ruin active-duty soldiers and veterans through neglect: the private sector contributed too, in its own exploitative way. During the War on Terror, huge numbers of veterans became a target for unscrupulous loaning companies. It emerged that leading banks and lending agencies in the US were failing to adhere to laws governing loan conditions to active-duty and retired soldiers. In 2011, one of the biggest banks in the world, JP Morgan Chase, was forced to announce a raft of new programs for military personnel after three veterans filed a lawsuit against the bank for overcharging interest payments on mortgages.[99] Under the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, which dates back to 1940 but was updated in 2003, interest payments for soldiers cannot rise above 6 percent. Lenders are also barred from foreclosing on mortgages of service members while they are on active duty. “The mistakes we made on military foreclosures are a painful aberration,” said Jamie Dimon, chief executive of JP Morgan, in the aftermath of a Congressional hearing. “We deeply apologize to our military customers and their families for these mistakes.” JP Morgan then set their interest rate cap for service members at 4 percent.

But it was evident, despite the crocodile tears, that exploitation of the veteran community was no aberration for financial institutions. “I just think JP Morgan ignored it, they didn’t care about it, they didn’t want to know about it,” Bob Filner, a Congressman from California and ranking member on the House Veterans Affairs Committee, told me. “And I think the other banks are doing the same thing.” Veterans are a particularly vulnerable group, he added. “They get too discouraged and they feel powerless, so they can’t fight back.” Filner had been approached by mid-level staff at JP Morgan, Bank of America, and Wells Fargo who told him the lawsuit was part of something much bigger. And leading veterans’ groups supported these claims. “There’s been a constant stream of veterans complaining of overcharging and problems with banks,” Selena Coppa, who dealt with veterans’ financial difficulties for Iraq Veterans Against the War, told me. “This is an industry-wide issue, it’s not solely limited to JP Morgan. Too many financial institutions see service members as numbers in ledger that they can exploit because of their unique vulnerability.” When in the military, service members can be hit with a criminal charge for being overly indebted, which causes some to accept bad practices. “Let’s say you are being exploited by a bank: in the civilian world you would dispute that, you wouldn’t pay it,” Coppa said. “But if you’re in the military even if it’s an unfair charge they are forced to pay under threat of jail under military law.” It was even tougher for those veterans with PTSD who lived so close to wire anyway, meaning that one small economic injustice could be devastating. Many winded up being evicted. “I had a friend of mine, she was incorrectly charged for a late fee, they refused to grant her time to pay it, especially, vets suffer from PTSD [and] have difficultly navigating bureaucracy,” said Coppa. “There is also the problem with the veteran population that they are very proud, which makes it difficult for them to come forward and talk about it”—and easy for unscrupulous creditors to prey on them: aware of the vulnerability of service members, loan-shark-type schemes are often set up around military bases.

The situation got much worse as the financial crisis hit in 2008 and the number of foreclosed veterans rose significantly. “I’ve noticed this being a problem for the last few years,” Joe Sharpe, economic director at The American Legion, the largest veterans’ group in the US, told me. “This had included vets having a problem paying mortgages while they are deployed. It’s a shock once they return to discover their home mortgage has tripled or been foreclosed.” According to Sharp it has even affected the operational readiness of the force. “I remember it came to a head recently, it became such a problem that unit commanders were concerned they couldn’t deploy large numbers of soldiers because they were in financial trouble.” Soldiers have the added problem that when they are away, they are not aware of what’s happening at home. Thanks to the extended deployment periods they also had less time or opportunity to respond to legal issues. Because of this, default judgments were often entered against them unfairly. “I think lives were destroyed. I said the banks could be guilty of homicide,” Bob Filner added. “We are at an all time high for the number of people committing suicide on active duty—higher than Vietnam. Financial stress is the second leading cause. Now who knows how many people did that because not just JP Morgan, but Bank of America and Wells Fargo didn’t do what they should have. If they were foreclosed on illegally, and the wife left them, and he felt he couldn’t support his family, I have no doubt that if we looked into the record closely we would find that.” The Department of Veterans Affairs does offer its own mortgage scheme which has better terms, but not all service members chose to use it because it is incredibly complicated. The VA told me they helped 66,000 veterans fight foreclosure in 2010 through interceding with the lender (but there were 20,000 more who sought help but could not forestall the loss of their homes). “What has happened is that the vets with VA home-loans have fared best,” says Joe Sharpe. “Those that did not get VA home-loans are the ones that are getting in trouble.” Those with VA loans have, indeed, demonstrated the lowest serious delinquency and foreclosure rates, but even the VA admit that their loan scheme is very difficult for veterans to use because its terms are so opaque. “We recognize it is a complex law,” Michael Frueh, VA spokesman, told me by way of an explanation.

Unsurprisingly, in this climate, homelessness among returning veterans remained extremely high during the War on Terror. The most extensive survey of the problem, published by the Housing and Urban Development Department (HUD) and VA, found that nearly 76,000 veterans were sleeping rough on any given night in 2009.[100] On top of that, nearly 140,000 veterans spent at least one night in a shelter during the same year. Some of those are older soldiers, but the study also found that 11,300 younger veterans, aged eighteen to thirty, were in shelters at some point during 2009. Nearly all of them had served in Iraq or Afghanistan. Ronte Foster was one of them. When he came home in late 2004, he had changed radically. His wife no longer recognized the affectionate family man she had married and waved off to Iraq just a year earlier. He was drinking every day, taking a cocktail of drugs, and erupting in fits of anger as he tried to self-medicate his way through the PTSD he didn't even know he had. She stood it for six months, eager to salvage their eight-year marriage, but then she broke, no longer able to put up with the consequences for her and their two young children. "She told me to leave and at that point I had so much trauma in my head, I just had to get away," Ronte tells me. He had been deployed to Tikrit, hometown of the erstwhile Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, and had duly witnessed one of the bloodiest and most chaotic periods of the war. "The unit that I went with, we saw a lot of roadside bombs and a lot of RPG's, you saw that on a daily basis," he says. He was also involved in firefights which led to deaths that still haunt him. "I had to do some things I didn't want to do," he says. "There was this one incident where some insurgents tried to rush the gate of the base, I was there at Camp Anaconda and we killed one and three were captured, it's still with me." When he left his family in Danville, Virginia, he went as far as possible, running from the war and the memories that were still fixed in his head. He relocated to Los Angeles and slept in the car and at friend's places. "I would get very depressed, I felt this intense isolation," he says. "I realize now that I was experiencing a lot of the PTSD symptoms, I had a hard time remembering things and concentrating for any period of time." Ronte got lucky and was taken in by a Salvation Army shelter where he became a resident floor manager. But seven years on from his return from Iraq, Foster is still not housed in permanent accommodation. "It's not perfect but I'm much luckier than other people I know of." He has no job and cannot afford his own food.

There are thousands of veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan with similar tales, but these are stories it is painful for America to hear. In 2011, however, the budget deficit and the search for programs to cut put the problem firmly back on the agenda. The HUD-Veterans Affairs Supportive Housing program, or HUD-VASH, is a flagship scheme working to help homeless veterans by issuing vouchers which can be used to pay for accommodation. Since 2008, it has issued around 30,000 vouchers and by 2011 the program had placed 21,000 veterans in permanent accommodation. But in the Republicans' proposed budget for the fiscal year 2011 it was completely eliminated, which caused outcry amongst Democrats and in a veteran community that had already been subjected to outrageous cuts to its health facilities by the GOP during the Bush era. The Republicans' "decision to slash funding for housing assistance to thousands of homeless veterans shows a total lack of humanity," said Barbara Boxer, a Democratic Senator from California.[101] After a compromise, the program was salvaged, but the department only got about 7,000 vouchers, less than the typical 10,000, after the Republicans bargained them down.[102] With veterans continuing to stream home, most analysts said this was far from enough and left community-based organizations to pick up the pieces. One of those community-based groups, US VETS, runs the shelter that Ronte Foster now lives in. The organization was started in 1993 in response to chronic levels of homelessness among the veteran population and it now has 2,000 beds in five states, making it the largest non-governmental provider in the country. "There is a lot of PTSD around because it is an all-volunteer [military] and they are doing everything they can to keep soldiers," said Steve Peck, chief executive. "They are going on multiple deployments . . . which is exacerbating the problem. The DOD is aware of the problem and they are doing something, but it's a lot bigger than they can handle." The lack of funds for medical and psychological treatment made the situation worse. When soldiers are discharged they are not required to go back to the VA for treatment, and it is estimated more than half were not accessing the treatment they need. Even those who did seek help were often told by the VA that there was a three or four month waiting list, which for someone with PTSD can be extremely difficult. By 2010, veterans were committing suicide at the rate of eighteen per day, many of them after serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.[103]

The military's use of soldiers outside of the regular army, as they strived to keep up troop levels, had a particularly negative impact. "What makes this different from Vietnam is that half of troops to Iraq and Afghanistan are reservists and national guardsman," John Driscoll, chief executive of the Coalition for Homeless Veterans, told me. For reservists the pressures from combat and training are particularly stressful because they lack the experience of their regular army peers. This is compounded when they come home, as they do not go through the typical transition program to help them adjust. “Anyone in a combat role knows you need decompression time, you need transition time to get your issues back in order,” added Driscoll, himself a veteran. “During that time you have spent away from home you have changed. The way you communicate is different, so when you add to that extreme economic pressure from the housing crisis and economic slump it’s not a pretty picture.”

At the same time that it was exploiting veterans, corporate America was enjoying the fruits of the markets these same veterans had prized open for them in the Middle East. As the US began the withdrawal of its remaining 40,000 troops from Iraq at the end of 2011, US officials were trying desperately to shore up the position of the American business community. With domestic economic growth slowing fast (and hurting veterans), US companies were increasingly keen to exploit the potential of Iraq’s post-war recovery. One example was 360 Architecture, a Kansas City–based design company, which was busy drawing up plans for a glitzy $800-million sports complex in the southern oil center of Basra. With the 2013 Gulf Games scheduled to be held in Iraq, the public-relations-conscious government was looking to build a stadium and facilities for athletes. “It will be like an Olympic training ground for Iraqi national athletes of all sports,” John Radtke, 360’s project director, told me excitedly. But there were surely better things to spend Iraq’s new oil money on. How about schools? In 2008, only 50 percent of primary school age children were attending school, down from 80 percent in 2005. Or foodstuffs? By 2007, 28 percent of Iraqi children were malnourished. But such concerns didn’t interest the State Department, which in the same period hosted a forum focused on “promoting commercial opportunities in Iraq” with representatives from nearly thirty major American companies—including Goldman Sachs and Monsanto. They joined Hillary Clinton, secretary of state, alongside other senior US and Iraqi officials to discuss economic opportunities in the “new Iraq.” “Basically, the bottom line is we want to send a message that Iraq is open for business,” a senior US official told me. “The US government will do whatever it can to get them into the market.” Around that time, Caterpillar, the Illinois-based construction equipment and natural-gas turbine manufacturer, won part of a $6.3 billion contract to build fifty new power plants in Iraq as the country sought to increase its electricity output; while Lockheed Martin, the arms manufacturer, announced that it had a deal in the pipeline with Iraq and Oman for the sale of eighteen F-16 fighter jets, to be ready by 2012. The Maryland-based company said it expected up to one hundred additional orders from Iraq by the end of the decade.[104] America's veterans—and the large numbers of Iraqis mired in poverty—would see none of the profits.

CHAPTER THREE

Plump, Young, Dumb—and Ready to Serve

THE BAGHDAD BULGE

Obesity is not just a public health issue. It's also a national security concern as well. We're not physically fit to defend ourselves.

Dr. Carlos Crespo, associate professor of social and preventive medicine at the University at Buffalo, 2002[1]

America is getting fatter. It has been for decades. But only during the years of the War on Terror did the country's obesity problem become a full-on, deadly serious national security issue. Nothing was more likely to put Al-Qaeda at ease than the thought of a waddling phalanx rumbling towards them in Iraq or Afghanistan, but as the wars got underway, that's what happened as standards in the US military relating to body fat and fitness were relaxed: as the recruiting pool shrank, the waistlines of soldiers got bigger. The US soldier in the War on Terror weighed thirty-seven pounds, or 25 percent, more than his ancestor in the Civil War,[2] and obesity was by far the most common medical reason why prospective soldiers were refused entry into the military. And the situation was getting dramatically worse. In 1993 about 23 percent of prospective recruits would have been overweight—a pretty significant tranche. By 2006 this had increased to just over 27 percent, or more than a quarter of potential recruits. In the same period, obesity countrywide had increased from 2.8 percent to 6.8 percent. "We're not physically fit to defend ourselves," complained Dr. Carlos Crespo, a University of Buffalo professor. "As a society, we need to be physically prepared to respond to natural disasters, acts of terrorism, or any other emergency."[3]

The military gauges the physical fitness of its recruits using a measure called the body mass index, or BMI, which measures body fat as a percentage of overall weight. The BMI of a prospective soldier must not be more than 26 percent for a man and 32 percent for a woman. "An increasing number of young adults in the general population do not meet the current weight-for-height standards," lamented one military report. Among eighteen-year-olds who applied for military service in 2006, 35 percent of males and 28 percent of females had a BMI above 25, it added.[4] "I'd say that out of every 10 applicants that come in, probably three we couldn't take—they are obese," said Sergeant Darryl Bogan, a recruiter in Columbia, South Carolina. "We are getting heavier as a nation as far as our young people are concerned."[5]

Until 1960 there were no regulations on obesity; when soldiers were weighed it was to find out if they had enough not too much weight.[6] But that was before America ballooned. "There is no question soldiers are getting bigger—just look at photos of soldiers from the 50s," said Lieutenant Colonel Karl Friedl, the army's director of operational medical research, adding that that difference is a reflection of general weight gain among the whole population.[7] But something had to change. "The fatter America gets, the more lenient the military is going to get with their regulations," he added. Even before the war in Iraq was launched the Pentagon knew what a stickler this could prove. "If at some future time the federal guidelines are adopted, the impact will be to shift a sizeable group of personnel from a category of meeting weight standards to a category of being overweight," a leaked Pentagon report said.[8] "Such a change would have negative implications for perceptions of readiness of the forces." But readiness was of less importance than maintaining the force. And some believed it was purely a perception thing: did it actually matter? "The military, of course, has standards for appearances: you don't want a bunch of fat guys marching in your parade. But how critical is it? It is of significance, but in critical terms, that significance is marginal," said Arthur Frank, a medical director at George Washington University.[9]

Untightening the Belt

The most obvious way around the problem was the use of "medical waivers" to make exceptions for overweight recruits. In 2006, medical waivers constituted about 30 percent of all army waivers and 25 percent of those for the marines.[10] But this still wasn't enough, and in 2004 the military began a string of programs aimed at recruiting the fat of America into its fighting force. First, the army set up a program with the Olympian title of Assessment of Recruit Motivation and Strength, or ARMS, which was designed to cut some slack for recruits who didn't quite meet the army regulations on body fat. It became a sort of "automatic waiver" for recruits who had body-fat percentages up to 30 percent for men and 36 percent for women. Like being back in gym class, the recruits who fell in the upper margins of this criterion would be made to do a different "Harvard step" test exercise to other recruits, one which involved stepping onto a platform 120 times per minute, followed by a number of push-ups. If you made it through, there was no need to worry about being overweight, you were deemed army good and had a full year to get yourself in shape. One lucky beneficiary was Kyle Kimball who in 2006 wanted to follow in the footsteps of his father and enlist in the marines. The problem was that he weighed 250 pounds, about 35 pounds over the cut-off for a marine of his height. But he went to Westover Joint Air Reserve Base in Chicopee, Massachusetts, and became one of the first to take advantage of the ARMS scheme, taking fitness tests as a way around his weight problems. "I can get there," he told the Boston Globe, "I know I can lose the weight."[11]

On top of that, $6 million of federal money was granted to the Troop Recruit Improvement (TRIM) program run by the Nutrition Research Council, the aim of which was to "improve recruit readiness and fitness by determining and combating the causes of childhood and adolescent obesity."[12] Dr. Andrew Young, Chief of the Military Nutrition Division in Natick, Massachusetts, was an adviser on the TRIM project. "We definitely have seen that soldiers are not immune to the obesigenic environmental factors of this country and the rest of the world," he told me. "The military now recognizes that some of the soldiers in the army and probably other services are having trouble maintaining healthy body weight." Young claimed further that obesity is rising in the army. "The goal for us is to design intervention programs for soldiers to use in coping with problems of obesity," he added. "The environmental pressures are growing—more and more soldiers have duties that are not as active—not all soldiers have very physically demanding jobs, some have a relatively small physical component. The environment promotes fat gain unless we are aggressive to counteract those pressures."

During a 2009 visit to the army's largest training installation, General Bostick said a slim-down camp could be part of the new Army Prep School at Fort Jackson in South Carolina, which was giving prospective soldiers the qualifications they needed in order to serve. "We are looking at the Army Prep School as a place where we might send some that have weight issues," he said.[13] Bostick argued that although many of the young people who want to join the army have a hard time understanding the importance of a healthy diet and daily exercise, they could nevertheless get themselves up to the required military standards with guidance. "It took them 18 years to get to where they are at, so it's very difficult for them to lose the kind of weight that they need to on their own," he said. "[The military] are doing this because they are desperate," added Lawrence J. Korb, a former Pentagon chief of personnel during the Reagan administration. The desperation was starting to show in July 2008, when the Healthy Eating and Lifestyle Training Headquarters (HEALTH), an online program that designed troops a personal weight-loss program, was set up at Fort Bragg. It wasn't just a beefy army, either. The air force—or "chair force" as it was rechristened—had its own ideas and started its own Fit to Fight program in 2004. "I want to make very clear that my focus is not on passing a fitness test once a year," General Jumper said. "More important, we are changing the culture of the Air Force. This is about our preparedness to deploy and fight. It's about warriors. It's about instilling an expectation that makes fitness a daily standard—an essential part of your service."[14] The program required commanders to institute some sort of daily fitness routine. Lieutenant Colonel Friedl, however, as an expert in weight issues, believed all this wasn't enough. "It's a shame to lose somebody that you've invested a lot of money in and it's their career as well simply because they can't meet these standards and for lack of providing some kind of specialized assistance that might have made all the difference." But the specialized assistance was too expensive; it was easier to let the troops' waistlines expand.

Obesity Within the Military

Once in the military, there is ample opportunity for soldiers to pile on weight, as they sit around at checkpoints all day, or eat continually from boredom. The army has regulations to deal with this—or at least it should have. Every soldier is expected to stay in shape and pass biannual fitness tests, including screening for weight. If they fail that, they are put on to the “weight control” program, which has a strict regimen of exercise and dietary requirements. It’s not good for your career either: you can’t be promoted while on the program. The marines had their own version of this with the Body Composition Program—if a marine failed to get back in shape while in the program they risked discharge from the military. In 2008, however, an investigation revealed that only about one in three marines found to be overweight was actually enrolled in a BCP.[15] As these programs were neglected things predictably got worse. “In the past decade among active military members in general, the percent of military members who experienced medical encounters for overweight/obesity has steadily increased; and since 2003, rates of increase have generally accelerated,” said a 2009 Pentagon report.[16] But despite the increasing number of “medical encounters,” the military has discharged ever fewer service members for not meeting weight standards. In 1998, 2,224 soldiers were discharged from the army for not meeting the standards. In 2006 that figure had fallen to 589—a 74 percent drop in eight years.[17] This was not, of course, because the military’s anti-fat programs had suddenly become much more effective. “These statistics should be seen against the background of the army trying very hard to maintain its overall numbers,” Dr. Russell Pate, professor of health sciences at the University of South Carolina and a military adviser on obesity, told me. In his opinion, “They’ve been granting waivers to the weight exclusion program in the interest of meeting targets.”

Some saw the proliferation of fat soldiers in a more positive light. Indeed, in the eyes of one group, it was a seminal moment: “I think it’s great that they finally understand our value in society,” Lynn McAfee, of the Council on Size and Weight Discrimination, told me. “Now they finally understand that everyone can play a part in defending our country . . . It’s absurd that as desperate as we are now for soldiers,” she continued, “we’re still kicking out people of worth and people of value because of how they look. But I’d like to think this is a turning point.” But the notion that overweight people swaddled in many pounds of Kevlar might not be fit for wandering around a desert in 30-degree Celsius heat has more to do with common sense than discrimination. McAfee had supporters in the US military brass though, who (as usual) denied there was a problem or anything to worry about. Nathan M. Banks, Sr., a spokesman for the army, dismissed the charges out of hand, telling me: “Soldiers realize how important it is to stay in shape. Especially in time of war, the heat in Iraq can get up in the 100s, soldiers carry body armor that weighs over 60 pounds." This explanation isn't bolstered by the statistics: from 2005 to 2006, there was a drop from 801 to 589 in the number of discharges for obesity.[18]

Despite the military refusing to kick out its tubby service members, there were still attempts by soldiers themselves to use it as a means to avoid fighting. Failing your fitness test is a way to avoid exercises or combat, one that doesn't carry the heavy burden of going AWOL. "There is a problem in the Army with overweight soldiers and malingering," said Specialist Oittis D. Allen in a letter to the Army Times. "These soldiers are claiming to be hurt so they don't have to participate in physical exercises, and they don't work like the rest of the soldiers. The doctor will write them a temporary excuse to malinger; the doctor will not sign off on a permanent profile knowing their only medical problem is they are overweight." The whole process was broken. "The Army regulation for overweight soldiers is to give them a certain amount of time to lose the weight or be discharged, but the chain of command is finding ways to overlook the situation," he continued. "In my company, I have seen several cases of soldiers being promoted even though they can't pass the Army Physical Fitness Test, along with passing weight and tape standards. I'm getting tired of the system being unequal. I and other soldiers are putting out 100 percent for the Army to get the mission accomplished, while the obese soldiers get everything given to them."[19]

Back home from the warzone, veterans had more given to them with yet another new overweight initiative by the VA (created in 2006), called Managing Overweight Veterans Everywhere, or MOVE. The program sought to help veterans escape their obesity or prevent them from falling into it when they return home and was piloted at James A. Haley Veterans Hospital, Tampa, Florida, where it was coordinated by nurse Norma Figueroa who oversaw about 400 veterans. "The veteran population is mostly obese and so we as a team decided the best thing to do was to help with prevention," she told me. "I don't know anybody who has been kicked out for being overweight," she added, "because it's not happening. They provided a program, but they let them all stay."

Medical Concern

This oversight was hugely damaging. The Pentagon themselves admit that being overweight "is a significant military medical concern because it is associated with decreased military operational effectiveness."[20] This includes the obvious fact that a lack of physical fitness and a few extra rolls of flab are going to make you less of a force on the battlefield, but it also puts a strain on the military medical services as overweight recruits are more likely to develop chronic health effects. "One of the implications is that having a significant number that are overweight there is a higher incidence of negative outcomes, limitations on work performance, but also to the profusion of veteran health care," says Dr. Pate. "There is the impact on physical performance; it's true that, to take a simple example, if we have 150lb person who has normal percent body fat today but five years later has 20lb [excess] that is going to have negative impact on performance, he will run slower, lift his body weight fewer times, in terms of combat military specialities which are done based on physical performance it's certainly true that you would expect negative impact on performance . . . I think the overriding issue," he continued, "is that in the broad sweep having significant numbers in military who are overweight is a concern in terms of soldier performance and both soldier and veteran health overall."

The Pentagon officially blamed the proliferation of video games and fast food for military chubbiness, but they must take at least part of the blame insofar as they allowed fast food joints to take over from mess halls as places for soldiers to eat in Kabul and Baghdad. In Baghdad's Green Zone there were outlets for Pizza Hut, Subway, Cinnabon, Burger King, and Taco Bell. There was also the Post Exchange, a military supermarket selling T-bone steaks and other goodies. Standing outside Burger King a journalist caught a group of soldiers contemplating a second Whopper burger. "Not me, man," said Specialist Joe Lorenzo. "I put on so much goddam weight, who knows if my wife will recognize me when I get home?"[21] It was made worse as operations were handed over to local Iraqi troops, leaving US service members with less and less to do—apart from eat. "You make the best of the situation," said Private Jonathan Roane. "We used to eat to fight. It's not like that anymore."[22] Their British allies were not much better. In a 2009 memo, Major Brian Dupree said: "The numbers of personnel unable to deploy and concerns about obesity throughout the army are clearly linked to current attitudes towards physical training," adding that "operational effectiveness" was being undermined.[23] It was even putting lives at risk. A British inquiry in 2007 revealed that Private Jason Smith had died of heat stroke in Iraq after concerns about his weight. It found he was "at the higher level of obese" at 17 stones and his BMI was dangerously high at 34, the implication being that it precipitated his death.[24]

INTELLIGENCE OPS

> If you come from a poor family, you are more likely to drop out of high school. And if you drop out and stay out of high school, you are more likely to be poor.
>
> Neve Grant, NPR, 2006[25]

On a sunny morning in August 2009 the ribbon was cut at the inaugural Patriot Academy on a National Guard installation in Butlerville, Indiana. It was the first institution of its kind in the US and pulled in a crowd of high-powered political figures from around the state. Indiana Democratic Representative Barron Hill and Indiana Lieutenant Governor Becky Skillman stood watching the theatrics, including a flyover by Blackhawk helicopters and other celebrations to mark the opening. There were reasons to be cheerful: the Patriot Academy would be the first military entity charged with giving a high school diploma to "at-risk youth" who wanted to serve in the National Guard but couldn't because they had dropped out of education, which was a bar to enlistment.[26] There was a heady feeling in the air as those giving speeches attested to the importance of this generous new educational experience. "The Patriot Academy can be described in two words: second chance," said Colonel Perry Sarver Jr., the Academy's commandant. "These soldiers are here because they have unfinished business, and they are getting a second chance to right a wrong. These young men have started down a path that will change their lives forever."

The project was the brainchild of Lieutenant General Clyde A. Vaughn, the former director of the Army National Guard, who had been troubled by the number of young Americans still not fit for service in the military. Why not provide high-school-age youth the opportunity to earn a diploma as an active-duty soldier, thereby bypassing the bar on enlistment for high school dropouts? It was "an investment in our most precious resource," he said, an opportunity to help the youth of America at the same time as defending American's freedoms. At the Patriot Academy, the students would receive full-time military pay and benefits while they were training. The first class beginning their journey on that afternoon was just forty-six students with a staff of thirty, but there were big ambitions for the program. Two years later it had expanded to 250 students and by 2011 reached 500. For its soldier students, the Academy was the real deal: it had secured Indiana educational accreditation which meant that their qualification would be a bona fide high school diploma, so graduating soldiers would be classed in the military hierarchy as so-called tier 1, opening up the full range of opportunities throughout their career in the armed forces.

There were a few requirements for enrollment: recruits had to be between seventeen and twenty years old and within ten credit hours of high school graduation. But those successfully picked would spend a period in basic training, then nine months at the academy before moving to a school which focused specifically on the military occupation (meaning job not country) in which they were interested. Giving those who had not had a good start in life a second chance while at the same time swelling the army's ranks did sound like a good idea, and there were the usual euphoric reports from the media: "Only months ago, four dozen high-school dropouts from around the country faced a bleak future and limited opportunities in the work force. Now they are soldiers at the Patriot Academy, on their way to earning their high-school diplomas and credits towards a college degree," wrote one military reporter. The new soldier students seemed chipper, too: "I'm going to be a Fire Support Specialist," Private Michael Meadows, nineteen, of Daleville, Indiana, told US Fed News. "But I have to get my diploma here first before I can go to Advanced Individual Training. I've been looking forward to this."[27] But of course it was not an altruistic Pentagon program (they tend not to exist). The Pentagon wanted and needed recruits and was prepared to hold young people's hopes for an education hostage to service in the War on Terror. This new program marked a full-scale militarization of the recruits' education, with no real pretence otherwise. When the nine-month program was finished the soldier students would be obliged to commit to eight years of service with the National Guard, which had been increasingly involved in the occupations of Afghanistan and Iraq. "The Army National Guard has had a significant evolution in the last eight years," said Raymond Carpenter, acting director of the National Guard, in Congressional testimony. "Units mobilized and deployed from different states and territories provided support to overseas contingency operations and to the Homeland Defense mission."[28] In other words, they were sure to have to fight. The parents of the new students seemed aware of the inevitability that their loved ones would see combat. "War abroad, or war on the streets," said one mom, giving an apt description of the choice facing young, poor Americans. "At least he'll be fighting for something," the dad added.[29] The National Guard was to be the Trojan horse used to penetrate the wider community, which had still not completely sacrificed its young for the war effort. The Guard had a sterling record in this regard, one lauded by military bigwigs. Army Brigadier General Maria Britt, commanding general of the Georgia Army National Guard, speaking at the DOD's Worldwide Education Symposium about the Guard's youth and voluntary education programs, noted, "The Guard has a proud tradition of initiating and funding education programs that reach out to non-military adults, youth and . . . schools," adding, "We do this because we want to be good stewards in the communities that we serve."[30] In truth, it had nothing to do with being good stewards. The Patriot Academy was another way to blackmail the poor who have been failed by the mainstream education system only to be failed again once in service.

Despite all this, the Academy was no doubt a serious enticement. One of the new soldier students put it like this: "Just the fact that I could get a high school diploma rather than a GED sounded better to me. It just makes me feel and sound like I've completed my school. Like our sergeant major once told us, we're not going to get this chance again. If you get the opportunity to come to the Patriot Academy to have your second chance, you actually get paid to go to school and learn new things."[31] Amid all the rhetoric about "second chances," Iraq and Afghanistan weren't mentioned in the prospectus. And reports on the initial student body left no doubt about the ethnic demographic the military were targeting. "The current class at the Academy is a mix of Americans from a wide group of ethnic and racial backgrounds," reported the army's official news service, before quoting Private Rigoberto Rodriguez, who grew up in El Paso, Texas: "Being a minority with other minorities helps me to feel at home," he said.[32]

Student Soldiers

It wasn't surprising the military should focus on this pool of potential recruits; perhaps the only shock was that it took until 2009 to inaugurate the Academy. High school dropouts posed one of the major obstacles to the recruitment of America's youth. A report by a non-profit group composed of retired military figures entitled Ready, Willing, and Unable To Serve spelled out the problem, contending that 75 percent of eighteen- to twenty-four-year olds do not qualify for service, adding "many young Americans who want to join cannot."[33] The three most common barriers for potential recruits were, it said, failure to graduate high school, a criminal record, and physical fitness issues, including obesity. The criminal record had been dealt with by "moral waivers" and the obesity problem dealt with by "medical waivers," but restrictions on non-graduates would be more difficult to sidestep. Approximately one out of four young Americans lacks a high school diploma and like any military, the US needed "high-competent individuals who can operate high-tech machinery and computer machinery," soldiers who can "work in teams" with "excellent judgment." "That cannot be acquired just in basic training," the report concluded, so dropping the standards on educational attainment would not be so easy to do without seriously affecting operational readiness. The other option, of course, was that education would have to improve. But would it take the need for more fodder for the War on Terror to convince the political elite to raise educational standards? The report believed it had to: "The most proven investment to help kids graduate from high school starts early: high-quality early education for at-risk kids." It never happened.

Over the previous decades the US public school system had been steadily degraded and exam results continued to be appalling relative to other developed countries. The National Assessment of Education Progress reported in 2007 that 69 percent of the nation's eighth graders scored below proficiency level in math, and 70 percent scored below proficiency level in reading.[34] A study of high school dropout rates found it hit a trough at 20 percent in the late 1960s and then increased just 4–5 percentage points afterward, and in terms of black and Hispanic students, it found "no evidence of convergence in minority-majority graduation rates over the past 35 years,"[35] while high school dropouts were disproportionately from poorer families. As one journalist put it, "If you come from a poor family, you are more likely to drop out of high school. And if you drop out and stay out of high school, you are more likely to be poor."[36] Of course, the government didn't embark on a splurge of spending on the education system. This was the perfect demographic to reenfranchise into the military: Black, Hispanic, poor, and with a high probability of being unemployed. It would be an extension of the existing demographics of the fighting force: according to research, recruits from families with annual incomes below $60,000 are over-represented in the military, while those families earning more are under-represented.[37] The military now dangled a carrot: we'll give you a proper education if you agree to become war fodder afterward.

During the War on Terror, George W. Bush's educational reforms were further impacting the public schooling system through increasing standardization and lack of funds. "There is a dark side to the educational reforms initiated under the Bush administration and now used in a number of school systems throughout the country," wrote educational theorist Henry Giroux:

> As the logic of the market and "the crime complex" frame the field of social relations in schools, students are subjected to three particularly offensive policies, defended by school authorities and politicians under the rubric of school safety. First, students are increasingly subjected to zero-tolerance policies that are used primarily to punish, repress and exclude them. Second, they are increasingly absorbed into a "crime complex" in which security staff, using harsh disciplinary practices, now displace the normative functions teachers once provided both in and outside of the classroom. Third, more and more schools are breaking down the space between education and juvenile delinquency, substituting penal pedagogies for critical learning and replacing a school culture that fosters a discourse of possibility with a culture of fear and social control.[38]

It sounded remarkably like boot camp. Giroux continued, "Any youth of color in urban school systems, because of harsh zero-tolerance policies, are not just being suspended or expelled from school. They are being ushered into the dark precincts of juvenile detention centers, adult courts and prison." During the War on Terror another "dark precinct" opened up: the military.

Typical of this move from the streets to the warzone was another National Guard program called the Youth ChalleNGe, which describes itself as a "preventive rather than remedial" at-risk youth program that specifically targets participants who are "unemployed, drug-free and law-free high-school dropouts, 16 to 18 years of age."[39] The twenty-two-week program, which takes place in camps, most of which are on military bases, is followed by a year-long mentoring relationship with someone from each youth's community. "By taking them away from their neighborhoods, we're giving them a safe place to get their act together," one colonel assured the critics. "These youths have been told they are failures. Here they find that if they straighten up, others will believe in them."[40] But it wasn't about providing disadvantaged youths with a safe place. It was about militarizing their education and sending them to the most dangerous places in the world—Iraq and Afghanistan. Even though it claimed it was not a military recruitment program, during the War on Terror 15 to 20 percent of Youth ChalleNGe graduates entered the armed services or the National Guard.[41]

There was another way still for non-graduates to get into the military: the general equivalency degree, or GED, which can afford recruits a waiver if they score well enough on the military's entrance exam.[42] The army accepts about 15 percent of recruits without a high school diploma if they have a GED. Alive to this loophole, the military instituted another program in 2008, the so-called GED Plus, to give more of America's youth the requisite qualifications they needed to go and fight. It opened its first prep school for the purpose, targeted, of course, at tough inner city areas. The program involved a harsh regimen with an intense academic component starting at 5 a.m. "An hour of marching drills and military discipline is thrown in for good measure," reported AP.[43] The militarization of education was complete. The whole concept was, again, framed in terms of "helping these lazy layabouts," the rhetoric sounding like something out of Full Metal Jacket rather than a caring teaching environment. "It's a tough, structured day. Some of them have sat on the couch for eighteen years, but I haven't heard any howling yet," social studies instructor John Solis said. Apparently Solis preferred high school grads because of their "tenacity," but, he added, "the reality of current graduation rates has the army pressed to find an alternative."

With the GED behind them, the class goes through to basic training, which often includes combat training. Those entering prep school have to agree to a two- to four-year commitment, just like a regular recruit. "We have two missions: get the GED and prepare them physically and mentally for basic training," said the school's commander, Captain Brian Gaddis. "These kids may have quit at some point, but the big thing is, a lot of people have quit on them," Gaddis added. "We are not going to allow them to quit." The prison-like conditions were successful in getting recruits. In 2007 the GED Plus Program trained 709 soldiers, with a 73 percent success rate. In the next two years, 2,400 soldiers had a 95 percent success rate, significantly higher than the 69 percent national average success rate in the civilian GED program.[44] Things looked so good that in 2009, $18 million was ploughed into a new GED Plus educational complex on a National Guard campus in Arkansas.[45]

It all had a strong echo of the Vietnam era. Defense Secretary Robert McNamara had started his Project 100,000 in 1966, which was designed to get 100,000 men into the military who had failed the qualifying exam even at the lowered standards. McNamara presented the move as one that would improve the lot of America's "subterranean poor": exactly the same as the War on Terror narrative. "The poor of America . . . have not had the opportunity to earn their fair share of this nation's abundance," McNamara said, "but they can be given an opportunity to serve in their country's defense and they can be given an opportunity to return to civilian life with skills and aptitudes which for them and their families will reverse the downward spiral of decay." But it was a complete lie. As one historian describes it:

> Never well known, Project 100,000 has virtually disappeared from histories of the Johnson presidency. It was conceived, in fact, as a significant component of the administration's "war on poverty," part of the Great Society, a liberal effort to uplift the poor, and it was instituted with high-minded rhetoric about offering the poor an opportunity to serve. Its result, however, was to send many poor, terribly confused, and woefully uneducated boys to risk death in Vietnam.[46]

Likewise with Iraq and Afghanistan. "Project 100,000 and the abandonment of all but the most minimal mental requirements for military service were crucial institutional mechanisms in lowering the class composition of the US military."[47] Likewise again.

Even with the military working hard to give recruits the requisite qualifications in exchange for service, it still wasn't enough. Eventually they began to stretch the existing standards, allowing greater numbers of those with no qualifications at all to sign on the dotted line. "The DOD's benchmark standard calls for at least 90 percent of troops to be high school graduates," writes one academic. "Meeting those benchmarks has been a hallmark of the all-volunteer military since the end of conscription in 1973," and since the mid-1980s there had been a strict cap on recruits with no high school diploma. But this was to change. In 2005, the number of recruits with no military experience and with high school diplomas was 83.5 percent; a year later it had dropped to 73.1 percent.[48] "The overall quality of the force today is lower than it was a year ago," complained David R. Segal, director of the Center for Research on Military Organization at the University of Maryland. "It means they can anticipate more problem situations with recruits in the training cycle."[49] The army found another way to avoid admitting its problems through the handsomely named Tier Two Attrition Scheme, or TTAS, which would not count non-graduate recruits against the 10 percent cap if they were projected to have lower or similar attrition rates to graduates. "Compared with the costs of digging deeper into the relatively expensive [high school diploma graduates] recruiting market, the Army's ability to recruit more high-quality [non high school diploma graduates] could save millions of dollars in recruiting resources," said an army assessment.[50] It was merely a way to massage the figures. As Military magazine put it:

> The Army announced that 81 percent of its non-prior service recruits for 2006 were high school graduates. That was disturbingly below the 90 percent Department of Defense standard for every service. But the proportion of high school graduates would have been reported as 74.3 percent if the Army had to count the 5900 TTAS enlistees high school dropouts. The number instead is ignored. In March, Defense officials gave the Army permission to sign up 8000 TTAS recruits a year to ease increasingly difficult recruiting challenges.[51]

Despite all this, the military had the full support of lawmakers as they went about enlisting the poor and vulnerable young men and women of America. "I'm not totally naïve, but I have faith in recruiters," said Representative Joe Wilson, (R-SC). "There may be higher dropout rates. But a lot of times they're extending opportunities to minorities who wouldn't have opportunities otherwise."[52] The opportunities offered to minorities came, of course, at the expense of their service in war and the very real threat to their lives. What did it say about America that its ethnic minorities could only get the chance to better themselves by putting their bodies in the line of fire?

Intelligence Testing

Another way for the military to measure the brain power of recruits is the armed forces qualification test, or AFQT, which every prospective soldier has to take in an effort to weed out the slowest. For decades, the military had spent a lot of money and time developing psychometric tests because it believed in a strict correlation between operational performance and mental attainment. The testing was formalized as far back as 1968 and taken up by all branches of the military in 1976, but it didn't start rejecting low-scoring applicants until the mid-1980s. By the time of the War on Terror it was ingrained in the military recruitment process. The AFQT is a multiple-choice questionnaire very similar to an IQ test, or what psychologists call "G"—covering abilities from arithmetical reasoning to paragraph comprehension. From these results the recruits are put into five categories, running from

Category 1, the best performing, to Category 5, the worst. Army regulation shut out anyone who scored in the lowest category, and strictly restricted Category 4 to two percent of the intake. By 2004, Category 4 recruits still only accounted for 0.6 percent of new recruits. But a year later, with the military desperate, a new DOD directive allowed in up to 4 percent of recruits from Category 4. Before long, that percentage had reached double figures.[53] The military was literally getting dumber. The New York Times reported that recruiters were even being told to accept more Category 4 recruits. "A recruiter in Washington, who insisted on anonymity to protect his career, said that at the time, he was concerned about whether these recruits could handle the increasingly high-technology tools of combat," its report noted. "Another recruiter, in New York, who insisted on anonymity for the same reason, said this month that the Army seemed to care less about quality than about filling the holes left by soldiers who decline to re-enlist . . . It's about one thing: numbers," added the recruiter.[54]

For some, letting in recruits with low IQs was actually more equitable as it is an extremely controversial metric, not least for its common use by racists to give a dubious scientific basis for their prejudices. In the US, for example, Hispanics and African Americans score lower than whites on IQ tests, as was demonstrated by the infamous Bell Curve book in 1994.[55] But serious psychologists put this discrepancy down to the differing educational standards that exist between ethnic groups. The average black IQ is 85, below the 92 that is the 30th percentile cut-off point for joining the military, for example. There was compelling evidence that strict IQ testing was discriminating against young black wannabe soldiers. But there was also evidence supporting the military's claim that IQ has a direct impact on operational performance as well as monetary cost. The differential in how quickly recruits leave the military (attrition rates) provides one clear example. Army studies demonstrate about 80 percent of those with diplomas complete their first three-year term of enlistment compared to only half of those with a GED.[56] "Recruits with a high school diploma are also valued since years of research and experience show that high school diploma graduates are more likely to complete their initial 3 [years of service]," said one directive.[57] The higher dropout rate for GED soldiers means they must be replaced, which "drives up military spending because of the need to spend money recruiting, outfitting, and training new troops," reports Time magazine. The cost of signing up a new, fresh recruit rose from $15,000 to $21,000 in five years to 2008.[58] Further to that, the military has been concerned about levels of attrition in the first years of service because it is, they say, "disruptive, degrades unit performance, and wastes valuable training and recruiting resources."[59] This seems like an argument for recruiting those who are most likely to adapt to military life and stay the course. The army explicitly accepted that "the high school diploma has been a reliable indicator of 'stick-to-itiveness.'"[60] But it didn't stop recruits getting in without one: the military simply couldn't slow down. A study by Rand concluded that the diploma was also an important indicator of operational performance, which was a more serious concern. Still the military didn't move. "Generally, studies conducted in this area have supported the assertion that higher-quality personnel, in this case personnel with a higher AFQT score, appear to be more productive and to exhibit generally higher performance," it noted.[61] Two other studies supported that conclusion. One from 1986 tried to answer the question, "Are smart [gun] tankers better?" by using their firing scores at a standardized course, and found that there was a strict correlation between accuracy and AFQT scores; for example, an increase of score from Category 4 to Category 3 led to an improvement of over 20 percentage points in performance. This was a serious business. It goes without saying that a bad shot in the War on Terror could mean the difference between a dead and a living civilian, or even an American soldier being hit by "friendly fire." How many died as a result of this no one really knows, but there were large numbers of "friendly fire" casualties in the War on Terror. And then there was the money component: stray bombs cost.

None of this appeared to matter. The grand plan was in many ways coming together. High school dropouts composed 41 percent of the prison population in US, which, together with the new acceptance to ex-cons, was opening up the military to thousands more people. But, in truth, why stop at dropouts? They had already started recruiting in prisons; why not get into the high schools as well?

CHILD SOLDIERS

There is not a way out.

Military recruiter to seventeen-year-old Irving Gonzalez, 2008[62]

When Irving Gonzalez was seventeen years old he signed a non-binding agreement with the local military recruiter in Texas saying he would join the military after his final exams at high school. He didn't worry about it too much at the time. He was concentrating on his finals and one of the provisos of the so-called delayed enlistment program, or DEP, was that he could pull out at any time before the start of basic training. At the end of school, it turned out, pulling out was what he wanted to do. He had other ideas about what he wanted to do with his life which didn't involve service. But it wouldn't prove as easy as it should have. When he informed the recruiter who had signed him up, Sergeant Glenn Marquette from Greenspoint Recruiting Station in Houston, of his decision, Sergeant Marquette went apoplectic. Gonzalez, alongside his friend Eric Martinez, who had signed the same document, were subjected to a tirade of threats and lies from Marquette who told them that their lives would to-all-intents-and-purposes be finished if they decided to spurn the military. Although intimidated, Gonzalez felt something was not quite right and was smart enough to start recording the conversations he was having with Marquette, later releasing them to a local television network. The recording gave a depressing glimpse into the kind of recruiter-conduct towards America's children that became de rigueur during the War on Terror. "The main thing is, I want out. I don't want to be in it. I don't want to go to the army," Gonzalez told the recruiter in one conversation, to which the reply was that he would have to come into the recruiting station and see the company commander. Marquette then added, "There is not a way out. You signed a binding contract," which was a barefaced lie. Later, the recruiter went further with the threats: "I'll tell you what happens to you, OK? This is what will happen. You want to go to school? You will not get no loans, because all college loans are federal and government loans. So you'll be black-marked from that. As soon as you get pulled over for a speeding ticket or anything with the law, they're gonna see that you're a deserter. Then they're going to apprehend you, take you to jail . . . All that lovey-dovey 'I want to go to college' and all this? Guess what. You just threw it out the window, because you just screwed your life."

To a young, impressionable child this attack-dog routine was usually successful. His friend, Eric, was a case in point. "As things went further, I decided not to go [into training]. And when I told [the recruiter] that, she said I had no choice and that I had to go, so I believed her," he recalled. He told his mom who hatched a plan to say he had gone to San Antonio and was uncontactable. But even that didn't work. When his mom went to talk to Sergeant Marquette and told him that Eric had changed his mind and didn't want to go, he lied to her, too. "Marquette said that I had to go, and if I didn't, that I'd have a warrant for my arrest and I wouldn't be able to get no government loans or nothing like that. So, my mom doesn't really know anything about it, so she believed it, and she told me," he said. Fortunately, Gonzalez managed to contact Eric and tell him that he didn't have to go, that the recruiter was breaking the law, and that he could change his mind. It may have saved his life. Because of the smarts of Gonzalez, the boys didn't have to go to the deserts of the Middle East; but how many kids have been misled and told they have no choice is unknown. These two boys had family and friends strong enough to support them. Not everyone was so lucky. "Whenever we were thinking upon not joining, they started calling us and telling us that we didn't have a choice, you know, that we could say all we want, we don't have a choice to go or not, if we want to or not," Gonzalez recalled. To most kids this would have been a terrifying routine, but its success in getting kids into the military meant it remained a common one. A New York Times report revealed that the army investigated 1,118 "recruiting improprieties" in 2006 ranging from coercing young people to lying to them. The army substantiated 320 of these.[63]

American high schools were always seen as a "target-rich environment" for any recruiter, for obvious reasons: the kids are often not aware of their rights and are easily manipulated by monetary inducements. The US Army Recruiting Command is explicit about how recruiters are expected to operate in the nation's centers of learning and it's not pretty. "Without a strong high school program you cannot have a strong grad recruiting program," says the School Recruiting Army Handbook.[64] It's important to play to their aspirations and dreams, it continues. "For some students it is clear that college is not an option, at least for now. Let them know how the Army can fulfill their college aspirations. This is a key decision point and one you must pursue without fail." The tactics are blatantly underhand and manipulative. "Know your student influencers," it says. "Students such as class officers, newspaper and yearbook editors, and athletes can help build interest in the Army among the student body. Keep them informed. Tell them about the excellent educational benefits and the opportunities available in America's Army." It adds, "Always remember, the first to contact will be the first to contract." Recruiters are assigned target high schools and instructed to offer their friendly services—such as basketball or track coaches. “Deliver donuts and coffee for the faculty once a month,” recruiters are told, and “participate” in Black History Month and Hispanic Heritage Month, two of the most popular recruitment demographics for the military coincidentally. “Encourage college-capable individuals to defer their college until they have served in the Army,” it advises. If they ever do get to university, recruiters are instructed to get them as freshman while they are still vulnerable: “Focus on the freshman class [there] because they will have the highest dropout rate. They often lack both the direction and funds to fully pursue their education.” In the perverse logic of the recruiters it suits to have less federal funds for college fees, the military often being the only other option.

During the War on Terror, the resources poured into recruiting impressionable young people skyrocketed, with 1,000 new recruiters added in one year to bring high school kids round to the military’s way of thinking.[65] The Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps, or JROTC, expanded across the nation, and no child was free from their solicitations, even eleven-year-olds were taking part in the programs. Furthermore, in 2007 a Congressional cap of 3,500 for the programs was lifted which spawned a massive increase in the number of operations.[66] According to Congressional testimony in 2000 from the chiefs of staff of the various armed services, 30 to 50 percent of these cadets eventually enlist. The number would be higher still during the war years.[67] In the War on Terror, school became boot camp as one in ten high school students in Chicago wore a military uniform to school and took classes on shooting guns from retired veterans.[68] It was a process of shaping the minds of the young, planting seeds of war for fruit that would be readily pluckable when the kids reached the age of eighteen, ready to serve.

One of the main incentives offered was money—a lot of money from the perspective of a sixteen-year-old. In 2005, the army moved to raise the average bonus given to recruits when they signed on the dotted line from $14,000 to $17,000, with the possibility of as much as $30,000 for hard-to-fill vacancies.[69] Another of the military’s slogans was “Join the Armed Forces, get a free education,”[70] an offer many of America’s poorest kids couldn’t turn down, even though it was not true. It’s why Phylicia Coley, a tenth-grader with an A average, said she was thinking about enlisting. “That’s the most important consideration,” she said. “I want to be a psychiatrist. I want to go to a good school.” In 2008, the GI Bill provided soldiers in the service for three years or more with an average $6,600 per year in educational benefits, with a maximum of $39,636 for four years. But tuition, room and board, and fees at most universities cost a lot more: in the majority of cases, the GI Bill benefits don't even cover half the costs of attending college full-time. But that's not what the recruiter told Coley. "He said the Army pays for everything," she said after being briefed by him. There were other means of reeling in high school students as well, one being getting them to take the Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery, or ASVAB. The military describes it as a must if "you're serious about joining the military," or if the Pentagon is serious about you joining the military.[71] It's a timed multi-aptitude test, which is taken at over 14,000 schools and military institutions nationwide. Career counselors are the main conduit through which the students come across it, and they are encouraged to promote it. There's even a Dummies Guide to the test to help students get a good score. The test is supposed to give the military a better idea of where the student would be best placed in the military: "These tests will give you an idea of how you'll score, and identify areas that need improvement," the military says. "Don't skimp on preparing for this test. It's your future. Get the most out of it."[72]

No Child Left Unrecruited

The penetration of the military into the nation's bastions of learning had been gathering pace for decades. In 1996, in the middle of Bill Clinton's tenure, the Solomon Amendment, named for its sponsor, US Representative Gerald B. H. Solomon, permitted the denial of federal funding to any educational institution which refused to allow military recruiters to go about their business on campus. This increased level of aggressive recruitment was facilitated and supported by one of George W. Bush's flagship pieces of legislation. In 2001 the No Child Left Behind Act was signed into law with great fanfare and bipartisan support. The act was supposed to enforce a more standardized testing regimen, but deep into its thousands of pages was a directive that would prove to be of huge help to recruiters looking to pester high school students to sign up. Though it drew no comment from the media at the time, which probably didn't have time to read the whole thing, the Act stipulated: "each local educational agency receiving assistance under this Act shall provide, on a request made by military recruiters or an institution of higher education, access to secondary school students names, addresses, and telephone listings."[73] In other words, high schools would now be obliged to hand over the phone numbers of all their pupils (no matter how young) to military recruiters, so a process of grooming them for service in the US military could get underway. It represented the manipulation of US youth at its worst. Before the age of eighteen, young people were not trusted to vote, to make legal or medical decisions, among others, but now they were ready to be solicited for the job of putting their life on the line.

There was a little-known proviso which did concede that a "secondary school student or the parent of the student may request that the student's name, address, and telephone listing . . . not be released without prior written parental consent." But in the end this turned out to be a hugely misleading, as only parents with a thorough knowledge of the Act—unsurprisingly, not many—were aware of the clause. Investigative journalist David Goodman did the most serious research into the effects of this policy.[74] He found that the Pentagon had gathered the names of 34 million young people, what they called "the largest repository of 16-25-year-old youth data in the country," in something they called the JAMRS database, or the Joint Advertising Market Research & Studies program run by the DOD. Worryingly, the data has also been retrieved by private data firms, such as the Student Marketing Group and American Student List, who were paid up to $600,000 by the Pentagon every year to aggregate young people's purchasing choices.

The result was a full-scale militarization of high schools throughout America. A concerned BBC report profiled Sergeant Larry Arnold, a career soldier "with a charming line of fast-paced chatter" who "circulates through the town like a salesman."[75] The victims of his sales routine were the youth of Kokomo, Indiana—population 46,000—many of whom receive "cold calls" from the sergeant in order to get them to enlist. "He uses lists of student that federal law requires the schools to provide to military recruiters," the article notes, without referencing the offending No Child Left Behind Act. Therefore "it is not uncommon for students to get calls from every branch of the service." Sgt. Arnold said that army recruiters will make 300 calls a day, adding, "Pressure is always there. It's the army, it's your mission, and they drill that into you every day." There was one case which particularly caught the eye:

> Sgt 1st Class Arnold met 17-year-old Matthew, a quiet boy who may or may not be able to graduate from high school in the spring of 2007. He was not certain. If that was not enough cause for concern, Matthew's mother also confided that her son was taking two medications a day for Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD). Despite that clearly disqualifying medical condition, Sgt 1st Class Arnold admitted he was tempted to sign him up anyway.

The US military was acting like an African militia with grooming for service extended to kids as young as eleven in some cases. In the process, they were breaking the law. A report, Soldiers of Misfortune, by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) found that the US government was actually in contravention of an international protocol prohibiting the recruitment of children into military service when they are under eighteen years old.[76] It also noted that the US military disproportionately targets poor and minority public school students, but its findings were dutifully ignored after being submitted to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. Maybe that was because the US is one of only two countries (the other is Somalia) to have never ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Even so, the Senate puts the age minimum for recruitment at seventeen, but the report found that recruiters "regularly target" younger children, "heavily recruiting on high school campuses, in school lunchrooms, and in classes." The ACLU surveyed 1,000 children aged from fourteen to seventeen who were enrolled in New York City high schools as part of the report. One in five of the respondents said that class time had been given over to military recruiters, and 35 percent said that military recruiters had access to multiple locations in the schools where they could meet students. The ACLU contended that in their desperation the Pentagon had used the JROTC, which has access to thousands of junior high schools, middle schools, and high schools across the country, to systematically target children. Military recruiters use "exaggerated promises of financial rewards for enlistment, which undermines the voluntariness of their enlistment," the report noted. It detailed the use of "coercion, deception, and even sexual abuse" by recruiters. Punishment for such transgressions was rare. "The United States military's procedures for recruiting students plainly violate international standards and fail to protect youth from abusive and aggressive recruitment tactics," said Jennifer Turner of the ACLU Human Rights Project. African child soldiers, meet African American child soldiers.

Virtual War

The tireless effort to bring children into the orbit of the military was gathering pace even outside of schools, with underhand manipulation the order of the day. In 2009, Students for a Democratic Society found military recruiters scouting out Summerfest, the largest music festival in Milwaukee. They hadn't been an easy spot at first, as this time they were moonlighting as professional models, a developing tactic from the military that preyed on the sexual desires of pubescent America. Recruitment brass had enlisted the help of Encore Nationwide, providers of promotional models, to seduce America's young into service. Sex was soon supplemented by video games. There was a concerted effort to "make war fun," a job taken on by the army's first official marketing officer, Edward Walters, a thirty-eight-year-old West Point graduate and former marketing man for Kraft Foods. One of his first initiatives got underway in August 2008, in the form of the first and only Army Experience Center in Philadelphia (cost $12 million), a new variation on the recruitment office theme—this time providing arcade video games and a merchandise shop to reel the kids in. A 14,500-square-foot "virtual educational facility," it offered all the experiences of war played out in on-screen games and simulated exercises. Little kids could sit in a Humvee and think longingly of the deserts of the Middle East. The target demographic was hinted at by its location close to a popular entertainment complex and indoor skate park. Even so, the army maintained that it was not a recruitment center, although the twenty soldiers working in the facility were trained recruiters.[77]

Walters told the press that the army store was a "new kind of recruitment office . . . We're moving away from normal recruiting offices and desks to places where men and women can experience military service," he said, adding, "We've been doing that with innovative techniques like interaction with real soldiers and high-tech virtual experiences." In 2006, advertising agency McCann Erickson was enlisted to dream up a $200 million campaign with the "Army Strong" slogan to bring in even more kids.[78] "Traditional marketing has been challenging," Walters told the New York Post for its article entitled "An Army of Fun." "When you're just focused on TV and the Web, it's hard to get the full message out there." [79] In June 2010, however, it was revealed that the Center was to close down—a strange course of events considering the cost and its relative success: a newspaper report said that at least 236 recruits had joined the army through the Center and it had been attended by 40,000 people.[80] The organizers of resistance to the Center, who set up a website "Shut Down the Army Experience Center," claimed victory and said it had planned a protest just before the scheduled closing date.[81] Unbelievably, the military claimed that the installation was not intended to be permanent, but that its technology would be replicated around the country. The use of video games to glorify military combat, sanitizing its perception among the young, had, in fact, been a long-term strategy. In 2002, the Army Game Project had been released for download from the internet, allowing players to "fire on a rifle range, run an obstacle course, attend sniper school, train in urban combat and parachute from a C-17 transport."[82] It soon had eight million players worldwide. It was a serious operation to build, created primarily by the Modeling, Virtual Environment and Simulation Institute at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, California. Help was also at hand from the bright lights of Hollywood, as Star Wars creator George Lucas's company, Skywalker Sound, provided them with sound effects from the Terminator 2 movie. Soon after, an army office was opened with a staff of fifteen full-time video-game designers. The army proceeded to release the Virtual Army Experience, which it boasted was "based on actual missions" in its promotional video complete with images of Iraq. The game was the standard murder-fest, in which the player hunts down and kills the enemy, while, for instance, on patrol in Iraq. One journalist called it "a shoot-em-up, get-the-bad guys kind of affair."[83] It was the ultimate entertainment, except this time it was used to sign up kids for real war.

The Wikileaks release of the "Collateral Murder" video, showing a US attack on unarmed children and journalists in Iraq, brought the side effects of this video-game rendering of war painfully home. The language of the soldiers heard in the video revealed a complete dehumanization of the Iraqis on the ground, with words like "nice" being used to describe the massacre. The blame must rest partly with the army's use of video games to sell itself, which has numbed its young soldiers to the reality of war and destruction. It wasn't as if no one knew what effect it would have. In other domains, the idea that America's kids should be exposed to such unbridled violence was frowned upon. US lawmakers were clear: violence in video games is a corrosive force. A bill unveiled in December 2005 by Democrats Hillary Clinton and Joseph Lieberman proposed taking punitive measure against any business that sells or rents video games with an "adults-only" rating to anyone under age seventeen.[84] But things were different when it came to a military that kids were increasingly reluctant to join. For them, there was literally no escape from "adults-only" violence. In 2009, it was revealed that "Explorer" scouts, aged fourteen to twenty-one, were being dressed up in combat gear, given air guns, and taught to take on "counter-terrorist" duties and other law enforcement and military roles. "This is about being a true-blooded American guy and girl. It fits right in with the honor and bravery of the Boy Scouts," said A. J. Lowenthal, a tough-talking sheriff's deputy and Explorer leader in Imperial, California.[85] This glorification of violence and combat had a deleterious effect on the nation's youth. In 2006, at the height of the recruitment drive, police in cities around the country blamed a spike in violent crime on increasing levels of juveniles involved in armed robbery, assaults, and other serious crimes. Minneapolis police estimated that juveniles would account for 63 percent of all suspects in violent and property offenses, an increase of 45 percent from 2002, just four years earlier.[86]

Parent Fight-back

The militarization of schools and childhood didn't pass without heroic protest from a coalition of parents, students, and teachers, understandably upset at society's colonization by the Pentagon. In June 2005 the New York Times ran a feature titled "Growing Problem for Military Recruiters: Parents," citing a DOD survey which had found that only 25 percent of parents would recommend military service to their children in late 2004, down from 42 percent just a year earlier. The situation was so bad one recruiter said: "I had one father say if he saw me on his doorstep I better have some protection on me," before adding, "We see a lot of hostility."[87] Organized counter-recruitment parents teamed up with more established groups like the Central Committee for Conscientious Objection in order to make sure as many students as possible filled out the requisite forms needed to stop their details being handed over to recruiters. One was Tina Weishaus, president of the Highland Park Middle School/High School Parent Teacher Organization in New Jersey. "The recruiters really harangue people, and this is what parents are trying to avoid," she said.[88] Local lawmakers also got in on the act. In Arcata and Eureka, the county councils voted for a Youth Protection Act which prohibited the recruitment of anyone under eigtheen within city limits, before it was ruled "unconstitutional" by a federal appeals court.[89]

Students themselves were revolting. In the largely black and Hispanic New York City neighborhood of Bushwick, the kids led the fight-back against the constant harrying and intrusion into their schools. One recent graduate of a Bushwick high school, Tamara Henderson, told a story that has been replicated across the US. She remembered recruiters hanging around the school "at least once a week," asking for students' names and approaching them in the hallways with flyers. "I feel like they are just targeting blacks and Latino students," she said, echoing the recruiter's handbook. "We should be having college recruiters in our schools to present options to continue our education. Instead we are left with military recruiters, feeding us lies and empty promises."[90] This led community members to start working with local schools to counter the takeover. In 2003, the Bushwick School for Social Justice (BSSJ) was set up to work on campaigns and education, including counter-recruitment drives. Make the Road was another Bushwick-based activist collective that has organized street theater protests outside one of the two recruitment stations in the area. In one, kids dressed up in orange jumpsuits and had black hoods on to protest the 2005 Haditha massacre in which 24 Iraqi civilians were murdered. "We offer youth-led workshops on military myths, counter-recruitment and the cost of war. We also work collaboratively with other organizations on a city-wide level to fight recruitment in schools and on the streets," said Sarah Landes, education coordinator of Make the Road. But they had a problem: if they stopped allowing military recruiters in their schools, vital funding would be cut. "Schools with high poverty populations get Title III federal funding, which we cannot do without, nor do we have the choice to not accept it," said Mark Rush, BSSJ Assistant Principal. But they could distribute forms to students to prevent the school from being forced to turn over students' contact information to recruiters, as mandated by No Child Left Behind. It was an amazingly successful fight back. "I believe in our five years only two students have signed up," said Rush.

That success was ruefully noted by the military brass, who, not understanding why their drive was not working, turned on the young themselves. A 2007 navy presentation put the blame for the decline in enlistment on the reluctance of so-called "millennials" to sign on the dotted line. After detailing the falling numbers of recruits, it went on to decode youth lingo for the benefit of the audience—like "OMG," for "oh my god"—before asserting that "this is not just about a generation gap, this is an alien life force." The youth of America had apparently become "narcissistic praise monkeys" who "can get disgruntled if not praised for simply 'showing up' at work."[91] "The military is no longer on kids' radar," it laments, with many preferring college. Recruiters, therefore, had to try harder to exploit that educational dream. The report refers to an unnamed teenager who had said, "(If I join the Navy) I'd miss out on having the excuse of being a college kid and being irresponsible." But, in truth, it was the Iraq war that had turned the "millennials" anti-military, with 32 percent claiming it had made them "less patriotic," and 67 percent contending they are "less likely to join the military." It was a testament to the independence of the nation's youth in the face of relentless pressure and propaganda from authority figures. With this "over-praised" generation resisting being manipulated into service in the War on Terror in the numbers needed, the military turned to a more pliant, war-weary generation: their grandparents.

GRANDPA GOES TO WAR

Virtually every one of them is called Mom, Dad, Grandma, Grandpa, but they bring a special flair to every soldier in that group.

Colonel Kevin A. Shwedo, Army Accessions Command, 2006[92]

Charles P. Gaffney, Jr. had already been a soldier. In the mid-1980s, after quitting his job as an automobile specialist, he spent six years in the army, most of it in Germany, doing what he believed was his patriotic duty as an American citizen. When he discharged himself years later, he was looking for a fresh start. He moved to Las Vegas to pursue a post-military life, getting a job with a local Porsche dealership. At the time, serving in the armed forces again didn't occur to him—America had no direct threats and he had served his time with honor. But that would change on September 11, 2001. Like thousands of others, watching the destruction wreaked on the country he loved sent the lust to serve running through his veins again. In the years immediately following, however, he didn't reenlist: he now had twin baby daughters to take care of, and in any case his age prohibited him from joining up. He couldn't even contemplate the decision. Until January 2006, that is, when the situation changed. As the military scrambled for troops, the army raised its maximum age for recruitment into the service from thirty-five to forty. Gaffney was forty years old, just within the new limits. It seemed the perfect opportunity for the M-4 assault-rifle expert to get back to fighting for his country, so in August 2006 he entered the Arizona Army National Guard, a position that in less extraordinary times might not have meant combat. But this was the War on Terror, and Gaffney soon became one of the hundreds of thousands of reserve soldiers shipped off for a tour in Iraq, which finished at the end of 2007. “I won’t say I was upset he was going back, but I didn’t want him to,” his dad said later. Gaffney still had the same passion for the cause he had back in the eighties. “He told me it was for people’s rights around the world, for them to say what they want to say without other people beating them down,” his dad added.[93]

In keeping with the extended deployments of these years, Gaffney was redeployed in 2008 with the 101st Airborne Division, this time to Afghanistan. It would be his last trip. He never saw his baby girls again. On Christmas Eve of that year, just a few months after he arrived in the country, he was slain at his combat outpost in Paktika province in eastern Afghanistan after it came under sustained enemy rocket fire. He was forty-two years old, another American warrior who couldn’t put down his gun. He had believed the rhetoric of the War on Terror and sacrificed himself to bring democracy and freedom to foreign peoples and to protect his daughters. His memorial service at East Lawn was a poignant occasion, attended by more than 200 people who wanted to pay their respects and honor the fallen soldier who had received both the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart. The service finished with a three-volley rifle salute and one report noted “some attending the service sobbed quietly.”[94] “We want to ensure that the sacrifice this soldier made will never be forgotten,” said Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Kunk, rear detachment commander of the 101st Airborne. “This soldier had other choices, but chose the Army, because he believed his service to our country was important.”[95]

Gaffney was a hero to many, but countless others would follow the same path. When the age increase to forty didn’t work, six months later it was pushed up further to forty-two. In the six months following the first regulation change, the army recruited 300 soldiers over thirty-five years old, but only five of those were aged forty or older, one of which was Gaffney.[96] Over the whole year, the army enlisted 653 soldiers aged thirty-five or older —without them it would have missed its target of 80,000 recruits for that year.[97] The military paid lip service to the benefits of having older recruits but omitted to mention that it was chronic troop shortages that brought about the regulation change rather than some sort of eureka moment. “A few years ago, we had a marathon runner with a master’s degree who spoke Russian, and he wanted to join the Army,” said a Pentagon spokesman. “We said no because he was 40. Where is the sense in that?”[98] The army was now, apparently, on the lookout for recruits with more refined qualities

(contradicted somewhat by their penchant for criminals and extremists). "What we're gaining in terms of experience and maturity and desire is phenomenal," assured Colonel Kevin A. Shwedo, a director at Army Accessions Command, which oversees recruiting. "Virtually every one of them is called Mom, Dad, Grandma, Grandpa, but they bring a special flair to every soldier in that group."[99] He wasn't joking, either. In 2001, the military had established another enfranchisement program in which retired military personnel could be pulled out of their summer homes on Cape Cod and sent back into active-duty in support of "contingency operations." The so-called Retiree Recall initiative was, specifically, to "close gaps in hard-to-fill specialities."[100] But by 2009 nearly 3,000 veterans had passed through the program, while nearly 750 served in the Middle East—more than 1,000 were in the service in the same year.[101]

While a gray-haired Clint Eastwood may be capable of looking poised on screen, gun in hand, it was unclear if that could be duplicated in the real world. The military was intent on finding out. Grandpa now had a chance to stop telling his Gulf War I stories to the grandkids and join Gulf War II. Even a Vietnam veteran—Steven Hutchison, who retired from the army in 1988 as a member of the 101st Airborne division and was decorated with a Bronze Star and a Meritorious Service Medal—was among the first retiree recalls. In a familiar story, the events of 9/11 had pushed this soldier, who had experienced the Tet Offensive in 1968, to serve again. At the time, his wife dissuaded him, arguing that he had done enough to serve his country already. But she died of breast cancer in 2006, after being helped through her illness by her doting husband. In the heat of the trauma, Hutchinson had nothing left to stop him and signed up again at the age of fifty-nine. The military sent him on a tour of Afghanistan, initially in a non-combat role. When he came back to the US he arrived at Fort Riley to meet his new unit and some were shocked at his age. "I thought 40-something, maybe 50," said Staff Sergeant Rivas Nestor, who was seven years old when Hutchison retired from the military. Nevertheless, his unit was sent to Iraq as part of the First Infantry Division. Less than a month shy of his sixty-first birthday Major Hutchison was killed by a roadside bomb that exploded next to his vehicle near Umm Qasr. He was the oldest American soldier to die in Iraq.

Despite their apparent enthusiasm for bringing in the oldies, the army did stop the practice briefly after reaching the numbers it wanted through the "Grow the Army" program, which cost $15.1 billion in 2009, more than double the previous year.[102] But in September 2009 a message went out from Vice Chief of Staff, General Peter Chiarelli, reinstating the program "due to the recent approval of a temporary increase in active component end strength."[103] President Obama was now seeking to increase army strength by 22,000 over three years. The change allowed retirees on duty to apply for a one-year extension at the end of their current tour, and it opened the program to new applicants. "Retirees up to 70 years old can apply for a one-year tour, with the chance of renewal, through the program," the military promised. It was, however, understandable why the army had stopped the programs when recruiting figures were better. The older recruits were leaving the army at nearly double the rate of their younger peers: among the recruits signed up when the age restriction was raised, 11.4 percent from the thirty-five-and-up category left the army before serving a full year, a marked increase from the 6.5 percent among the rest of the recruits.[104] Older soldiers also found it harder to handle the rigors of combat. The army claimed publicly that it did not segregate older recruits in basic training or consider age when deploying them to different areas, but training exercises were undoubtedly a problem. "The type of training they receive is pretty much geared in one direction and focused on 18 and 20 year olds just coming in," Sergeant First Class Chris Patterson said. "When the older Soldier comes in, we don't know the kind of person we are getting. They bring to bear some experiences we haven't had. And we also have to take their physical strengths and abilities into consideration." This created problems for operational performance. The military knew it would have to change certain procedures to deal with this batch of older recruits: immediately they moved to lower the physical benchmark for them. On recruitment, a seventeen-year-old, for example, would be expected to do forty-seven sit-ups and thirty-five push-ups. For a forty-one-year-old this was a little easier with just twenty-nine sit-ups and twenty-four push-ups needed to prove themselves Army Good.

Unfortunately, bullets and IEDs don't discriminate in the same way. "Our training program has to ensure that every soldier is going to be able to outmaneuver, outfight, and win on today's battlefield," claimed Colonel Shwedo. But the truth was that older recruits like Gaffney and Hutchinson were at much greater risk of death and injury. In June 2010 it was reported that 566, or 12.1 percent, of the deaths in the War on Terror had been suffered by over-thirty-fives, a figure which dwarfed their representation in the fighting force.[105] The problem of PTSD was also more chronic in older soldiers: the older brain is not able to follow the rules of engagement as easily and is more questioning, which makes it more susceptible to traumas. It wasn't just battlefield problems either. The older recruits were at much greater risk of dying from the host of ailments associated with mature years. "Military service is a young person's profession. The physical in the first six months of service can be particularly stressful for older people," said David Segal, director of the Center for Research on Military Organization.[106] But the military refused to kick people out who couldn't hack it. One older soldier to pay the ultimate price was Staff Sergeant William Chaney, another veteran of the Vietnam War. He died of a blood clot aged fifty-nine, after surgery for a medical condition and appendix problem that had necessitated his evacuation from Iraq. He had signed up thinking that Iraq would help him get over the bitterness he still felt over Vietnam and the military's failure to take care of him. "When he came back [from Vietnam], he had trouble joining the [Veterans of Foreign Wars] because they said he hadn't fought in a real war," his wife Carol Chaney said. "He wanted to be an air traffic controller, what he was trained to do in Vietnam, but he was told that training was not transferable back at home. That left him a little bitter."[107] The military rubbed salt in the wounds when he died by not even informing his wife of what had happened. She discovered his passing when she called to check on him in hospital. "It is the most horrendous experience," she said. "I hope no other family has to go through this."

A Family Affair

From 2000 to 2006, the number of new soldiers over thirty soared by 92 percent nationally.[108] It turned the American military experience into a family affair, as parents joined up with their kids and were shipped off to the Middle East together. Margie Black, a forty-one-year-old grandmother from West Columbia, Texas, signed up with her twenty-one-year-old daughter. Russell Dilling, forty-two, of San Antonio, graduated with his nineteen-year-old son, Robert. Dilling said he had arrived at Fort Jackson at 11 p.m.—one hour before his forty-second birthday—the army's cut-off. "It's been tough physically, but my company has been pretty supportive," he said.[109] Older recruits joined up for a variety of reasons, from desperation to patriotism to boredom. "I was comfortable in civilian life and did that 9-to-5 thing all the time for a long time. I was just in a rut," said thirty-nine-year-old Private First Class Randy Covington. "When they changed the age, it seemed like the opportunity came back for me."[110] "When I'd see a soldier walk down the street when I was a small child, they'd look so disciplined, so sure," said Private Aletha North-Williams, a forty-one-year-old mother of two from Houston. "I wanted that for myself, and it has always stuck in my soul."[111] Politicians, however, rationalized the program by pointing to the changing demographics of the nation. "In part, this decision is an indication of how difficult the recruiting environment is right now," admitted Representative Vic Snyder (D-AR), the ranking member on the Subcommittee on Military Personnel of the House Armed Services Committee. "But [it] is also part of a changing society, a healthier and longer-living society, and Army standards ought to reflect that." He had a point. A federal report in 2008 found life expectancy for Americans continued to increase and older Americans were in better health than previous generations. As the baby-boom generation entered middle and old age it was changing American demographics. In 2006, an estimated 37 million people in the US—12 percent of the population—were sixty-five and older, and this was forecast to reach 20 percent by 2030.[112] "We're finding there's a lot of people out there that wanted to join, and age was their only disqualifier," said Leslie Ann Sully, a spokeswoman for the army's local recruiting battalion near Fort Jackson.[113]

There was a lot of talk about baby-boomers being a burden on the health-care and pension systems during the War on Terror, but many were now fighting America's wars and when the financial crisis hit in 2008 it created a new army of unemployed oldies. Not surprisingly all branches of the military met recruitment targets in 2008 and Pentagon officials publicly attributed the military's new popularity to the layoffs that hit America's biggest companies, pushing the national unemployment rate above 7 percent soon after. In the aftermath of the crisis, many older people lost their jobs, livelihoods, and self-respect in the middle of their lives—stuck supporting a family on unemployment insurance (if they were lucky). The newly open military became an obvious place to go. Basic military pay for the first four months of active duty was just over $15,500 a year, but more when benefits were included.[114] This was quite an attractive pay deal for those slung on the unemployment heap. "It's a guaranteed job, as long as you go to work every day," boasted Captain Jared Auchey, company commander of the Army Experience Center in Philadelphia, who estimated that one in ten of the enlistments are over thirty-five. "There are no layoffs in the Army," he added, not mentioning there are other ways to be "laid off" on the battlefield.[115] Staff Sergeant Arron Barnes spouted the familiar military line that older recruits tended to bring technical skills and maturity. Then he revealed the real reason for their desire to join: desperation. “They contribute at a higher level because they have no other place to go,” he said. “This is their life.” A new generation of desperate people whose lives had been torn apart by a financial crisis that was not their fault was now turning to the one place that promised redemption. Profiled by the New York Times, Specialist John D. Butts, thirty-eight, was emblematic of the recession-recruit:

> An aspiring writer who was a house painter outside Philadelphia for two decades, he lost his steady paycheck last November after the housing market crashed. A part-time job at Blockbuster did not pay his rent, and when his landlord threatened to evict him, his girlfriend (now his wife) and her three teenage children, he decided radical action was required. He called an Army recruiter he had met recently and signed up for a three-year stint. Despite years as a dedicated beer drinker and smoker, Specialist Butts made it through basic here at Fort Sill and is now training with an artillery unit that may head to South Korea this year. A tour in Afghanistan could be in the cards, he says.

It was the same place Private Gaffney had been sent to die.

CHAPTER FOUR

Outsiders

GREEN CARD SOLDIERS

The only for sure way of gaining citizenship through military service in the United States armed services is to die.

Marco Amador, filmmaker, 2010[1]

In late March 2003, the month the invasion of Iraq got underway, America received news of its first battlefield casualties. It was a stark wake-up call for the country and brought home the tragic human costs of war. "The violence of the war against Iraq made its way to small towns . . . when residents learned that one of the first military victims was someone they knew," wrote the Atlanta Journal-Constitution at the time.[2] The soldiers fell while carrying out one of the early objectives of the invasion plan—to secure the port city Umm Qasr in the south of Iraq. In older times a sleepy fishing village, it had been turned into a military port after the Iraqi Revolution of 1958 because of its strategic proximity to Iran and Kuwait. US Marines advanced from Kuwait as the invasion got underway, taking the port surprisingly quickly. But they then had to spend days securing it against what a British commander called "heavy resistance." "We were told Umm Qasr wasn't too bad, then we get reports of dug-in Iraqi infantry, it was hair-raising," said one platoon sergeant, Marc Montez.[3] One of the soldiers in his platoon who was trying to hold back Iraqi resistance was Lance Corporal José Antonio Gutierrez, First Marine Division, who had arrived in Kuwait just two months before aboard the USS Rushmore. In a major firefight on March 21, he became America's first casualty in the war, shot fatally in the chest by a fellow soldier, in a so-called "friendly fire" incident.

Except Lance Corporal Gutierrez wasn't an American casualty at all—the twenty-four-year-old was, in fact, Guatemalan, an orphan who had travelled 2,000 miles and crossed two borders illegally for his crack at the American dream. In death, there was no one in small-town America to mourn him, and his dream of becoming a US citizen was realized only posthumously. He had given his life for a country that was not even his own, a sacrifice made even more poignant considering the tragic history of US military involvement in his native country—which had destroyed his own family. Gutierrez was born in the small Guatemalan village of Escuintla at the height of the country's brutal civil war, which had raged from 1960 to the middle of the 1990s, and for which the US government and military establishment were in large part responsible. Before 1944, the Guatemalan elite composed 2 percent of the population but had control of more than 60 percent of the land, according to historian Walter LaFeber.[4] "The poorest 50 percent of the population owned only 3 percent of the land but depended on [it] for their food," while half the population were indigenous and earned less than $100 a year while being subjected to brutal and harsh discrimination by the ruling elite.[5] The country's corrupt dictatorship was overthrown in 1944 by a student-led middle-class revolt and in 1951 the progressive social democrat Jacobo Arbenz Guzman came to power in democratic elections. He planned and enacted a huge redistribution program that gave land back to the previously disenfranchised poor and Indian population. In doing so, he particularly upset the United Fruit Company, a US-based multinational company that controlled a large proportion of the region's fruit production and transport.

For the then incumbent in the White House, President Dwight Eisenhower, this was confirmation that Guatemala was close to teaming up with the Soviets. He soon ordered the CIA to train Guatemalan exiles to get rid of Arbenz and Guatemalan democracy. Though not at this stage actually affiliated to the USSR, "the frightened Guatemalan government gratefully accepted a shipload of armaments from the Soviet bloc." Eisenhower needed no other pretext and ordered the CIA-backed exiles from their bases in Honduras and Nicaragua to start attacking Guatemala. This was supported by American-operated planes that dropped dynamite onto Guatemala City, its capital. Arbenz had no choice but to flee and the exiled leader, General Carlos Castillo Armas, took control. The remnants of the reform movement were put before a firing squad and the pre-revolution order was reinstated, clearing the way for decades of brutality and oppression. Philip C. Roettinger, a US Marine colonel who was instrumental in liquidating Guatamalan democracy, wrote in 1986 that his actions "turned out to be a terrible mistake . . . Our ‘success’ led to 31 years of repressive military rule and the deaths of more than 100,000 Guatemalans.”[6] It was actually a lot more. In February 1999 the Truth and Reconciliation Commission established to investigate the atrocities during the civil war squarely blamed the genocide of the Indian population on the right-wing military dictatorship, which was supported by the US. American military advisers and the CIA had also helped design the “scorched earth” campaign in which 440 villages disappeared from map. When the killing finally abated in the 1990s, 200,000 people had been killed or disappeared. “The United States must not repeat that mistake,” President Bill Clinton said simply in the aftermath.[7] A few years later, in the attack on Iraq, they would repeat it, and Gutierrez would pay for the “mistake” a second time.

In the late 1970s amid countless hideous massacres of the Indian population in the countryside, Gutierrez’s Mayan parents had been forced to flee to Guatemala City which was being flooded with people seeking a safe haven. Their son, José, was the embodiment of this broken and abused society: when both his parents died, he was forced to live by his wits on the streets, one of 300,000 street kids that shame the country to this day. At eight or nine, and undernourished, he was saved by Casa Alianza, a UK charity that takes in street kids. He was lucky: many of his friends on the streets would die before they reached their teens. But inside he was “bleeding with loneliness and sadness,” said Patrick Atkinson, the director of the orphanage. When he arrived at Casa, he was still looking for his mother who had died. No one had told him that when people die they don’t come back, and as he got older his yearning for a family led him to search desperately for his sister. “He was always talking about his sister but couldn’t find her, he didn’t know where to look,” said his mentor at Casa. Eventually, with the help of a social worker, he tracked her down; but José dreamed of a bigger family and of becoming an architect so he could build a house for himself that no one could throw him out of. These dreams couldn’t, he gradually recognized, be achieved in Guatemala. At fourteen, he told his friends there was nothing left for him in the country and he wanted to leave. They tried to dissuade him from the perilous journey north to the US that so often ends in death or prison for thousands of Latinos. But early one morning, he caught the bus to the Mexican border and waited until dawn to wade through a river into Mexico before catching a freight train north, the start of a journey that would take him 2,000 miles and put him between the wheels of fourteen different trains. Along the way he worked on food plantations to stay alive. At the US–Mexico border it took three attempts to get over, but he was smart and pretended to be Mexican, avoiding deportation back to Guatemala. In the back of his mind was his beloved sister, Engracia, who had promised to follow him north if he was successful. On arrival in the US, he was soon picked up by immigration authorities who let him stay after he told them he was sixteen and applied for asylum. He was put with foster parents, themselves Latin American immigrants, but still made sure to send $20 or $30 back to his sister from small jobs he did while he went to high school and community college.[8]

After being taken in by a number of foster families, in September 2002 he enlisted. "I remember when he came in . . . I had to interview them, find out a little about them," his platoon sergeant said later. "One question on there is 'Why did you join the Marine Corps?' And I distinctly remember his [answer], because I read it a couple of times and it said that, the reason he joined the Marine Corps was to give something back to the US, to give something back to the country that took him in basically. And that struck me pretty hard, like wow you know he's not joining for any other reason than to give back to the US, to the country." José's decision actually had much more to do with the desperation brought on by the end of high school and with it the foster child program. He was on his own—again. At the same time, his grades weren't sufficient to get him a scholarship to study architecture, his lifelong dream. He was enticed by the prospect of citizenship and the benefits offered by military service. "He wanted education, to be an architect, to write a book," said his social worker. "He said, 'I feel like I'm running out of time and I want to do it all, so if I get my education paid for by the government I can do a lot of things.'" The military was offering all sorts of inducements at this point, so he enlisted as a rifleman in the First Marine Division, based at Camp Pendleton, California. He had got the family he had always yearned for (in the form of the military), but less than a year later he was dead—apparently consumed with love for the US. Well, such was the story the military wanted to put out, and the media was happy to oblige in repeating the fairytale of the "patriotic foreigner." "Fallen Marine wanted to give back to adopted country"[9] ran the headline on CNN when he died. It was a lie. As a proud Latino, José didn't even want to learn English. "He was proud of being from Guatemala and he said he never wanted to be an American," said his social worker in the US. "José wasn't being himself. He was playing a role in order to reach his goal," added his mentor. But he was useful to the military in death. "The story that was told by the US embassy, by the US military, was a classic war propaganda story," said a close friend. "Once again using and exploiting [José] for their own ends. And you read this boy came to the States illegally at 14, wants to be an American, wants to be a Marine. You know what? False. Completely untrue. Why would they lie like that when the boy's story is so powerful for who he is?" José's dreams of becoming an architect and getting an education had actually never included military service. "He hadn't planned to do it," said his foster brother in the US. "He never intended to go into the marines. That's the last thing that would have occurred to him. What he wanted was to become an architect or professional soccer player. That's what he always talked about. I once told him I wanted to join the marines. He said, 'You're crazy. Don't do that. They're nuts.' It wasn't his thing. But after he graduated from high school he couldn't see any future for himself. He did it out of sheer desperation. What else could he have done?" He wrote to his sister frequently while deployed. One letter began: "Dear sister, things are different here, everything has to be done fast and be decided right away. In Guatemala I had no discipline and much less respect but now my life is based on discipline and respect. Life is so different, friendships get lost, people don't remember each other, they live to work, time goes by, my life has changed, but for you I'll always be the boy you knew as a child and met again as an adult, the one who can laugh and cry, who has known bad times and is trying to forget them. Write to me, send me a picture, a few lines at least, love you, don't forget that, pray for me and that we'll see each other again soon, stay out of trouble. José Gutierrez."

In death his coffin was draped in the Stars and Stripes, but his friends at Casa Alianza wanted to bury him at their Ciudad Vieja cemetery, which is where all the street kids killed by the police and security services are laid to rest. The US embassy told his sister that they already had a plot sorted in a more high-end cemetery and she didn't demur. "He's laying where he doesn't belong, he wasn't part of that reality, a cemetery with mausoleums as big as houses, houses that he never knew on the streets," said his mentor. "He's lying there all alone, cut off from us." It was the final insult.

Although José's story is singular and attracted a lot of media attention because he was the first soldier to die in Iraq, the War on Terror would see many other foreign nationals perish while serving a country which was not their own. As the Pentagon scoured the domestic population for recruits, it struck home that America—the land of immigrants—could look elsewhere. Its allies continued to use foreign fighters to swell their ranks, from the British Gurkhas to the French Foreign Legion, while the private military contractors populating the frontlines were enlisting recruits from all over the world. So why not the US military? Immigrants with permanent status, or "Green Cards," had been able to sign up for the military for decades, but the number enticed to do so shot up during the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, as the carrot of citizenship was held out in front of their noses. The rules stipulated that only immigrants legally in the US (i.e. with a residency visa) for two years were eligible to sign up. However, while in 2001 the number of immigrants who became US citizens while in the military was just 750, by 2005 that figure had jumped by 500 percent to 4,600.[10] The changing demographics of the US population added to the pressure. The foreign-born population of the US was the largest in the history of the country, up to 11.7 percent of the population in 2003, a significant increase from the 9.3 percent registered in 1995.[11] These people were often younger, and more vulnerable. "Immigrants will fuel much of the growth in America's youth population," said a report by the Center for Naval Analyses (CNA), a federally funded research and development center for the navy and the Marine Corps. About a third of the world's population was under fifteen, with the vast majority living in developing countries. "Because many will have difficulty finding work in their native countries, large numbers of young adults emigrate—either alone or with families—with many choosing the United States as their destination. Of the 16 million foreign-born people who came to the United States between 1990 and 2002, almost a quarter were under age 21." It was the perfect pool of new recruits and the CNA recommended mining the legal immigrant community more heavily. "One overlooked source of military manpower is immigrants and their families," it noted. "In fact," the organization concluded, "much of the growth in the recruitment-eligible population will come from immigration." It was the new American Dream.

In July 2002, George W. Bush issued an executive order which shortened the period that non-citizen soldiers would have to wait for citizenship from the usual three years to just one. He greased the path to military service further by waiving naturalization fees and allowing recruits to take the oath of citizenship at US embassies and consulates abroad rather than in the US itself. The incentives worked. "We've had a record surge of applications," said a spokesman for US Citizenship and Immigration Services, before lauding the ease with which immigrants could "apply for citizenship immediately, the day they are sworn in as members of the military."[12] In 2004, the US immigration agency started to conduct the first overseas military naturalization ceremonies since the Korean War. During 2005, 1,006 foreign-born soldiers became citizens outside the United States. As of May 2010, there were 16,966 non-citizens on active duty.[13] For the Bush administration, it was the perfect solution: the introduction of more immigrants would kill two birds with one stone, "as a way to address a critical need for the Pentagon, while fully absorbing some of the roughly one million immigrants that enter the United States legally each year."[14] Instead of providing a sanctuary or granting them amnesty, the Bush administration would use service in the military as a bargaining chip. It worked: there has been an extraordinary increase in the number of immigrant soldiers who have gone on to become naturalized citizens. From 9/11 to the end of 2009, 52,000 foreign-born soldiers had become full-fledged US citizens, more than one hundred of them posthumously after being killed in combat.[15] But while it served a purpose for the military, they weren't overly kind in their treatment of the immigrant soldiers. There was an important proviso that a Green Card soldier who obtains US citizenship through service in the military can have that revoked if they receive an "other than honorable" discharge before completing five years of service. With the prevalence of drug and alcohol abuses—alongside the traumas of untreated PTSD—running through the service, this proviso was invoked widely and impacted countless immigrant families. After returning from the Middle East with their family's futures in mind, some committed crimes and were put in jail, then, on release, deported. It sparked outrage among some lawmakers. Representative Bob Filner (D-CA), chairman of the House Veterans Affairs Committee, was a proponent of changing this part of the law so that immigrants who had put themselves in danger in war could avoid deportation. "You come back from Iraq or Afghanistan today, you have put yourself on the line for this country," said Filner. "An incredible number of kids come back with an injury or illness that puts them in trouble with the law. To simply have these people deported is not a good way to thank them for their service."[16] Dardar Paye was one of those who served the US proudly for many years, after coming to the country aged thirteen from the strife of Liberia. He joined the army in 1998 and went on to serve in the first Gulf War and then in Kosovo. In 2008, a decade after he signed up, he was convicted of six weapons-related offenses and went to federal prison. On being released, he faced deportation. “When I was in Kuwait, in Kosovo, I was like everyone else who was there, putting their lives on the line,” said Paye, who was an armored vehicle crewman in the army. “Now I feel like they just used me for what they wanted, and now they’re throwing me away.” (While waiting on his appeal, Paye was tragically murdered, his body found in the boot of a car with multiple gunshot wounds.) Everything had become much harder for immigrants with the passing of the 1996 Illegal Immigrant Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, which added crimes such as drug possession for sale to the list of serious offenses that could lead to deportation of a legal immigrant. “Drugs, anger management, weapons charges, that’s what a lot of vets are getting caught for, and there is no relief,” said Margaret Stock, a recently retired army reservist and immigration attorney who taught at the United States Military Academy at West Point. “The 1996 law really put the nails in their coffin,” she added.

Nightmare Act

On top of revoking citizenship once granted, the Bush administration was not short on ideas of how to send legal immigrants out to the desert in the first place. In 2007, the so-called Dream Act went before Congress, ostensibly as a way to provide immigrants with further means to citizenship, but, like all legislation in the period, including the No Child Left Behind Act, it had a military element. There was a crucial provision that would allow immigrants to achieve citizenship through either a two-year stint at a community college or military service for the same time period. With many immigrants unable to pay for the even the bare necessities, the chances of them being able to fork out for a two-year course seemed unlikely, as was the case for Gutierrez. Military service was the only other option. The Act also made extreme provisions for giving a Green Card to undocumented high-school students who agreed to serve in the military. It was eventually defeated in Congress, and then resubmitted without the community service option, before being defeated again in December 2010. The group Vamos Unidos, which represents Latino youth in the Bronx, New York, one of the main areas of recruitment activity, were particularly critical of the Dream Act’s provisions. “We demand that we return to our original DREAM ACT that had a community service option instead of a military one,” the group said. “The military has been losing their numbers due to the multiple wars the US has begun. The DREAM ACT would hand us over on a platter to fight these unjust wars. The DREAM ACT has been warped over the years to draft Latino youth into the military, as they need more and more soldiers to fight their wars.” The group called it a de facto draft.[17] At the time, influential military analysts and think tanks were beginning to voice support for allowing any foreigners who wanted to enter the military to become Americans, in a full-scale “barbarization” of the military. (“Barbarization” is the term used to describe the later Roman military when it started allowing outsiders, or “barbarians,” to fight in their army.) “Now is the time to consider a new chapter in the annals of American immigration,” wrote two of the biggest enthusiasts, Max Boot and Michael O’Hanlon, in the Washington Post. “By inviting foreigners to join the U.S. armed forces in exchange for a promise of citizenship after a four-year tour of duty, we could continue to attract some of the world’s most enterprising, selfless and talented individuals.”[18] Not only that, it would go some way to treating the problem of the millions of undocumented workers already in the US (and the million that enter every year)—a kind of amnesty with the caveat of military service. Who cares if they have to risk their lives to achieve their dream? In fact, Boot and O’Hanlon wanted to go even further: “We could provide a new path towards assimilation for undocumented immigrants who are already here but lack the prerequisite for enlistment—a green card. And we could solve the No. 1 problem facing the Army and Marine Corps: the fact that these services need to grow to meet current commitments yet cannot easily do so . . . given the current recruiting environment.” The de facto draft, in other words.

The cheerleaders for this new policy pointed to history for support (not Roman history, however). This kind of approach, they argued, had deep roots in the history of America’s armed forces, which was partially true. In one of the country’s most celebrated military victories—the Revolutionary War—German and French soldiers fought alongside the colonists to expel the British. In the Civil War about 20 percent of fighters were foreigners freshly arrived in the US, and English was “barely spoken” in some units. But that was 150 years ago. During the War on Terror, America was undergoing one of its most fervent anti-immigrant, jingoistic phases since the early 1980s, which didn’t sit too well with granting citizenship to thousands of immigrants. In November 2005 the Bush administration had announced it was to build a "virtual fence" along the Mexico–US border as part of a multibillion dollar effort to keep illegal immigrants out, incorporating a range of high-tech devices, including radar. The militarization of the Mexican border—likely pitting Mexican immigrants willing to serve against those trying to get across—went on unabated, while five years later, Arizona passed the most regressive immigration laws since Jim Crow: obliging police to query the immigration status of people whom they suspect are in the US illegally—i.e. brown, Latino-looking people. Boot and O'Hanlon were aware of this surge of jingoism, but told the racists not to worry. Everyone one was a winner—apart from those like José Gutierrez. "Nativists need not fear that this would lead to a flood of foreigners," they wrote. "Say we decide to recruit 50,000 foreigners a year for the next three years. That sounds like a lot, but it represents less than 10 percent of the total number coming to the United States anyway—and less than 10 percent of our active-duty armed forces. This would not radically change the demographics of our society or our military, but it would make a big difference in the size of the rotation base for our ongoing missions." In other words, white people can still rule the roost and we get fodder for our wars of aggression. It also made sense money-wise. The CNA found that non-citizens were "far more likely" to complete their enlistment obligations successfully than their US-born comrades. "Non-citizen service members have a long track record of military success," it noted. Thirty-six month attrition rates for non-citizens are between 9 and 20 percentage points lower than those for white citizens.[19]

Illegal Immigrants, Illegal Recruiters

Quietly, after the defeat of the Dream Act, something more insidious was passed in its stead: a law which gives the Pentagon power to bring immigrants into the US if it is deemed (in that beautiful piece of bureaucratic ambiguity) "vital to national security." Although this law hasn't been applied frequently, its has the potential to be widely used. The military had already started looking beyond the legal immigrants within its borders, casting its gaze to Mexico and the millions of desperately poor young men who dreamed of making it to the US. As early as 2003, the US embassy had to release a statement reiterating official policy that "undocumented or illegal immigrants cannot serve in the U.S. armed forces," after a US military recruiter was found to have visited in a high school in Tijuana, Mexico.[20]

The recruiter had apparently turned up after following a conversation with two potential recruits. “The U.S. Army does not recruit here. We don’t endorse them coming here,” claimed a spokesman. But the Mexican newspaper Milenio called the sergeant’s efforts “an intense campaign to recruit young high school students.” Other local newspapers contended that the recruiter handed out promotional literature to students, claims denied by the US. In 2005, activists reported ads on Facebook that offered a Green Card in exchange for military service, highlighting the fact that the US military didn’t just want foreigners, it wanted young foreigners, perhaps to make up for all the retirees it was letting in. The young were also impressionable and full of romantic ideas about the American Dream. Within the US, it was a similar story—with recruiters bribing young illegal immigrants in the nation’s schools. Arlene Inouye, a high school teacher in the Los Angeles unified school district, said: “It’s well-known, common knowledge that military recruiters do promise or offer to our undocumented students fake Green Cards.” A student at the same school, Salvador Garcia III, added: “They offered they would bring my father back from Mexico if I served a four-year tour in the United States military.”[21] In 2007, civil rights activist Ildefonso Ortiz Cabrera reported that while he was in Phoenix, Arizona, army recruiters suggested he go to a military base; he refused and instead returned to El Burrion, his town in Sinaloa, north Mexico.[22] Not everyone was so strong-willed but we never heard about them—they ended up in the Middle East.

The promise of citizenship was a serious incentive. For many young Latinos this was the only shot for them and their family. In April 2008, Green Card holder Arturo Huerta-Cruz, twenty-three, of the Tenth Mountain Division, was on patrol near Tuz in northern Iraq, when he was killed by an IED. Huerta-Cruz was originally from a small rural town called Hidalgo, Mexico, but moved to Florida when he was ten. His motives for fighting were accurately outlined by the Tampa Bay Times, which said his death “will further opportunities for his younger cousins, including [his] baby Arturo, who is a U.S. citizen,” adding, “The infant child will have opportunities never available to Huerta-Cruz. He can vote for president; he might become president. He can work for the government—as Huerta-Cruz once hoped—or he might pass along his name to the family’s growing list of natural-born U.S. citizens.”[23] The headline of the article was typical of the “patriotic foreigner” narrative the military and media pushed: “Mexican Citizen Died in Iraq Serving U.S., His Beloved New Land," it read. But the American Dream had started to look very different during the War on Terror: it was no longer affluent suburban life in Middle America, but indigent war life in the Middle East. Sergeant Ernesto Hernandez, twenty-six, a Mexican from Temple, Texas, saw the military as the only way out of working in dead-end job with the threat of deportation. His fear, he said, was forever "working at Wal-Mart, changing oil or working at McDonalds." Hernandez became a vehicle mechanic for the 101st Airborne, and was deployed to Kuwait soon after. "It's not a bad deal," Hernandez said. "Especially with everybody speaking English, you pick it up like that."[24] Despite all this testimony of desperation, the military claimed that the granting of citizenship was not among the main reasons for immigrant enlistment. "Money for education, wanting to serve the country, and to learn a skill are the top three motivations," said Douglas Smith, Public Affairs Officer at the US Army Recruiting Command, contradicting everything the recruits were actually saying.[25]

On top of this the military claimed immigrants were actually better soldiers because they had a better understanding of American democracy and freedoms than those born in the country. It was a desperate attempt to put a positive spin on the "barbarization" of the military. "In many cases, they have a personal experience from living in an area where they didn't have that freedom and liberty," said Lieutenant Colonel Keith Pickens, chief of staff for the division rear command of the 101st Airborne. "They're a lot closer to the American founding fathers than the average American might be," he added.[26] It was the same rhetoric that accompanied the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan: foreigners can only grasp freedom when they see American bombs. Some of the soldiers might have realized that in their native countries—including Guatemala, among many others—democracy had been repressed by the US government. But the patronizing tone continued. Military leaders lauded the "cultural sensitivity" of foreigners—compared to the high levels of chauvinism among the regular troops anyway. "The American Army finds itself in a lot of different countries where cultural awareness is critical," said Lieutenant General Benjamin C. Freakley, the top recruitment officer for the army. The CNA added, "Legal permanent residents, or green card holders, are more racially, ethnically, linguistically, and culturally diverse than citizen recruits. This is valuable on many levels, particularly at a time when the military is addressing the challenges of fighting terrorism."[27] But this new love for multiculturalism and diversity had its drawbacks. In the case of José Gutierrez, it can be argued that his lack of English contributed to his death. "He was holding security on one building, as they picked up he was on other side of building," said his platoon sergeant. "He didn't hear the verbal command . . . to get up and move."[28] Or he didn't understand it.

Life Is Cheap

The move to get foreigners to fight America's wars was controversial among immigrant groups, as it was essentially an extension of the already lopsided ethnic demographics of the US military during the War on Terror, in which minorities were disproportionately enlisted. It had unnerving echoes of the Vietnam War, where black soldiers were asked to fight to "defend" a democracy in which they had few rights: the new battalions of Green Card soldiers were fighting the same fight. Foreigners' lives are cheap—that is traditional imperial ideology, so it was clear quite early on that these recruits would not be stuck biting their fingernails at US bases for long. Many were sent straight into combat with no other option. The situation was made worse by a strange 2009 report from the Rand Corporation which found that Latinos were actually underrepresented in the US military. This increased efforts to find a way to get more of them in.[29] "For us, that's a huge problem. Mainly because in the invasion in 2003 in Iraq, 20 percent of the casualties in the invasion were Latino," said Marco Amador, a filmmaker.[30] But only 15.1 percent of the US population are Latino: if they are underrepresented in the military, how can 20 percent of those killed be Latino? The obvious answer is they are assigned more dangerous missions while on active duty. The charge that Green Card soldiers were merely cannon fodder looked uncomfortably true. For many in the immigrant communities it was the final straw as their communities had been gradually degraded by criminalization and deportations. "We have grown up with the trauma of having our family members and friends detained, jailed, and deported. But we are strong and determined, so we keep onwards," said one Latino rights group.[31] The reaction was similar to that of the parents who were fighting the militarization of childhood and education—the militarization of immigration was being equally resisted. A strange ideological alliance was spawned in opposition as immigrants' rights groups concerned with the blackmail received support from the anti-immigrant right-wing wary of a "flood" of immigration. It's "another example of the exploitation of cheap labor," said Jorge Mariscal, Vietnam veteran and professor of Latino studies at the University of California, San Diego.[32] It was another way to replicate the injustices of wider American society in its fighting force. "This is what the US military has always done. This is nothing new. They use the Latino community or the poor working class community in this country as their cannon fodder," added Amador.[33] Then there were the right-wing arguments. "We should go to any length to avoid developing a kind of mercenary army, made up of foreigners loyal to their units and commanders but not to the republic," Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which aims to bring down immigration, wrote in the conservative National Review. "It didn't work out well for the Romans."[34] He felt the profession would be sullied by the involvement of too many foreigners, putting American citizens off serving, similar way to the way Americans don't want to work fruit-picking. "If enlisting were a way to get legalized or a way to get into the United States," he continued later, "soldiering would become a job Americans would not do very rapidly."[35] There were frequent charges that Green Card soldiers were merely mercenaries, whose loyalty to the US military and the country more generally made them a risk. Recruiting a large number of non-citizens could change the main purpose of the military from that of defending the country to being "a way to get a foot in the door of the United States," the argument went. Those same critics didn't seem to mind the multiple private security firms who were populating the occupations of Afghanistan and Iraq (and other parts of the world); firms whose soldiers were literally mercenaries being paid private salaries without any government oversight, free from the legal constraints on normal US soldiers.

In fairness to the critics, it was true that the entrance of foreigners from far-flung countries—from Pakistan to Malaysia—into the US military posed serious concerns about the security of the troops—a priority extremely low down on the Pentagon's list when compared with bolstering the number of soldiers. With the evident US military insouciance towards extremism—including Islamic fundamentalism—it was the perfect opportunity for terrorist elements or foreign intelligence agents to penetrate the force. Egyptian double agent Ali A. Mohamed, who had served in the army as a supply sergeant at Fort Bragg in North Carolina in the late 1980s, did exactly that, providing Osama Bin Laden and his Al-Qaeda network with high-level information for terrorist attacks against US targets. The military had been extremely slow to come alive to his threat and it would end tragically. “Mr. Mohamed’s story . . . is one of appalling oversights by American national security, including the C.I.A., the F.B.I. and the Army,” said the New York Times.[36] His role in the September 11 attacks is unclear, but he has been charged with helping to plan the 1998 car bombing of the US Embassy in Kenya, which killed 224 people and injured 4,500. It appeared the army hadn’t learned its lesson. During the War on Terror, a new program was designed that specifically targeted immigrants skilled in medicine and languages: the first time since Vietnam that those on temporary visas would be allowed to serve. Recruits would receive US citizenship within just six months of service. The fact that the military was desperate for Arabic speakers added to the perceived risks. Of course, the Bush administration didn’t care. In fact, they were getting so desperate that it wasn’t just their natural right-wing aversion to immigrants that was being compromised. Even homosexuals, who had for decades been the target of discrimination by the Republicans, were enjoying a quiet renaissance. There was, however, one American patriot, fluent in Arabic himself, who would be among the last hauled from the military for the “crime” of being gay.

ASK, TELL

> People will look at Afghanistan and Iraq as the moment when lesbian and gay service members proved themselves to be part of the US military.
>
> Victor Maldonado, Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, 2008

Bleu Copas had always been a patriotic American but on September 11, 2001, that changed. As the carnage unfolded on his television screen that morning he moved from being simply a patriot—he now wanted to be a warrior. “I decided right then that as I had the ability and desire I would go ahead and serve my country, that I would act on my patriotic flair,” says Copas, a twenty-four-year-old from Johnson City, Tennessee. At the time, he was studying for his masters in counseling at East Tennessee State University, but he decided to put his studies on hold. “I felt like my country needed me then, and it couldn’t wait,” he tells me. Copas was young, educated, well built, and passionate about serving his country. He was the perfect candidate. There was only one problem: he was gay. “I was prepared to lie and keep it secret,” he says. At the time the military operated a “Don’t Ask, Don't Tell" (DADT) policy which dated back to 1993. It stipulated that homosexuals in the military must keep their orientation secret and if they bucked this rule or were "outed" by colleagues they would be discharged. It all went according to plan for Copas. He was put on active-duty service and, via the Defense Language Institute in California, he arrived at Fort Bragg, North Carolina, in 2004 and became part of the Eighty-Second Airborne division. He didn't even have to be overly private. "Throughout this whole time in the military, my colleagues realized my orientation but it was never a problem," he says. Until 2005, that is. Then an anonymous email campaign targeting Copas started up, circulating correspondence in which Copas had divulged his sexuality. Even then he was shown sympathy by his superiors. "My command tried to sweep it under the rug, they tried to get rid of it because they wanted to keep me, I had been promoted very quickly when they realized my skills," he says. But the emails continued unabated and spread to his colleagues. Eventually the command gave Copas an honorable discharge with health benefits. "They had no choice, they had to discharge me then," he said. But Copas realizes he was just very unlucky after his easy start. "I think, ironically, everything now is falling into place regarding discrimination against homosexuals," he said in 2008. "I was just the victim of a very aggressive campaign, I would have been fine otherwise," he added. He was also lucky to get an honorable discharge, which meant holding on to the benefits he was entitled to—a luxury not everyone enjoyed.

Figures obtained through the Freedom of Information Act support Copas's claims about the military turning a blind eye. The DADT policy had resulted in hundreds of discharges every year since it was enacted, but in the period of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the numbers of discharges fell precipitously. In 2001 there were 640 discharges for homosexuality; in 2006 it was 282—a 56 percent reduction.[37] Homosexuals were serving almost without hindrance. "I think that people will look at Afghanistan and Iraq as the moment when lesbian and gay service members proved themselves to be part of the US military," said Victor Maldonado of the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network (SLDN), an organization which campaigns against military discrimination against homosexuals. "The conflict will be the Rubicon for gays and lesbians in service and there will be no going back. More and more service members are serving openly and having no repercussions, they simply are gay, and it evidently does not affect their relationship with their colleagues or command." The situation was so open that, Copas added, “At one point in the barracks in Monterrey [California] I was staying on a floor with eight rooms, and gay people were in half of them. In fact they were everywhere, especially at the language institute. And there are several that I know serving openly in the desert right now.”

Before the DADT legislation, the extent of regulation on homosexuals was a 1982 DOD directive which stated that “homosexuality was incompatible with military service,”[38]— around the same time it was decided that being a Nazi was not compatible with military service. When he first came to power in 1992, President Clinton announced an executive order designed to completely overturn the discriminatory policy. In response, the Republican-controlled Congress put forward legislation that would have enshrined the existing directive in federal law, making it impossible for any president to overturn. The 1993 DADT policy was the resulting fudge. Clinton can’t be blamed for the intransigence of his Republican opposition, and the compromise was a huge improvement on what went before; but it was still one more twist in the long history of formalized discrimination against homosexuals in the armed forces. In the Korean and Vietnam wars homosexuality had been labeled a “mental defect,” and the military barred recruits based on medical examinations, much like modern-day Turkey does. But troop needs ebbed and flowed: during wartime the military quietly ignored its strict regulations on gays, only to revive them again in peacetime. This is why the gay civil rights movement was so intent on achieving its goal (repeal of DADT) during a period when the War on Terror—with its de facto repeal of the law—had shown gays could serve openly at no detriment to the military.

Arguments Against

The case against homosexuals serving openly is primarily a moral one derived from religious dogma, a dominant feature of the Bush administration. The strength of deep-seated moral opposition even within the military brass was strong throughout the war years. In 2007 one of its top commanders came out in favor of DADT and likened homosexuality to adultery. “I believe homosexual acts between two individuals are immoral and that we should not condone immoral acts,” said Marine General Peter Pace, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. “I do not believe the United States is well served by a policy that says it is OK to be immoral in any way.”[39] Although that was the real reason for opposition to the repeal, the critics invented logistical problems in an attempt to give their opinions legitimacy. Some said, for example, that enlisting openly gay service members would be detrimental to morale and cause problems with shared bedding in the barracks and bases. It was implied that gay soldiers would be unable to handle the living conditions, with military guidelines noting that the armed forces are a "specialized society" where the same laws for civilian society don't apply—military service, of course, is "characterized by forced intimacy with little or no privacy."[40] Critics of the repeal also pointed to attrition rates. In a 2009 article for the Washington Post a group of retired military officers wrote that the "repeal of this law would prompt many dedicated people to leave the military," citing a Military Times poll that indicated 58 percent were opposed to the repeal and that 10 percent wouldn't reenlist if it went through.[41] They didn't mention that the new Irregular Army meant many homosexual soldiers were serving openly anyway—estimates put it at 65,000. But with a tenuous bit of extrapolation they arrived at a figure of 228,600 for the potential loss of military personnel. "We don't need a study commission to know that tensions are inevitable in conditions offering little or no privacy, increasing the stress of daily military life," they concluded.

But what they should have been more worried about was the attrition rate of gay service members themselves, who comprised a significant portion of the fighting force. Many of them could not understand why they had to hide their identity and personal life while risking their lives for their country. Jennifer Hogg, a New York National Guard Member, said, "Being a lesbian on 9/11 is what initially led me to begin to question my involvement in the military and the military's involvement in the world," before adding, "If on 9/11, I did not have the freedom to hug my girlfriend goodbye before we left as a unit for NYC, then what freedom was I protecting? What freedom could we offer to the world if we treat it so restrictively based on who a person falls in love with?"[42] During the War on Terror this struggle for freedom took the same form as the civil rights struggle in the 1960s, when young black men were being sent to fight for a democracy they couldn't vote in. Patriotic homosexuals had served in all of America's wars anyway, bypassing the persistent efforts to disenfranchise them. Some of America's most revered fighters, like Baron von Steudben, were reportedly gay. He had been a Prussian military officer who served as inspector general during the American Revolutionary War, passing on his expertise to guide the Americans to victory. Navy doctor Tom Dooley was another: his humanitarian mission in Southeast Asia made him a legend in his lifetime.

The available evidence also contradicted the arguments of the critics of the repeal of DADT. A 2010 poll of veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan by the Vet Voice Foundation found that 41 percent of service members under the age of 35 favored gay and lesbian soldiers being able to serve openly, to 35 percent against.[43] Over-thirty-fives came in 36 percent against, to 31 percent in favor. A Zogby poll in 2007 found 73 percent of troops who had served in Iraq or Afghanistan were comfortable in the presence of gays. They had also proved themselves particularly loyal and fastidious in duty. Lesbians serve proportionally more than the rest of the female population. Between 1990 to 2000 lesbians aged eighteen to twenty-seven had three times higher rates of service than their straight peers. And they served longer, too: 82 percent report serving for two or more years, compared to 74 percent for the wider population.[44] Attitudes were changing in the general population as well, as the de facto repeal of DADT proved it could work. In early 2010 a poll by CNN and the Opinion Research Council found that 69 percent of the public were in favor of allowing homosexuals to serve openly, with just 27 percent against.[45] That was a big step forward. In 1994, the year after DADT was instituted, the figure had stood at 53 percent in favor. Around the world, the experience of the US's closest allies was adding further pressure. In 2000, the UK lifted its ban on gay soldiers after a ruling from the European Court of Human Rights called it a "grave interference" into people's private life.[46] Israel was even further ahead of the curve, ending its restriction in 1993, the same year as DADT was instituted. Research has shown that serving openly had no detrimental effect on the morale or effectiveness of the Israel Defense Forces. "It's a non-issue," said David Saranga, a former IDF officer. "There is not a problem with your sexual tendency. You can be a very good officer, a creative one, a brave one, and be gay at the same time." There had been many attempts to overturn the policy within Congress, most effectively from Representative Patrick Murphy, who was the first Iraq war veteran elected to Congress. His experience there with British forces convinced him that open serving would only improve the service. He sponsored a bill for the repeal. "I take it as a personal affront to our warriors," he said. "To say that other countries' soldiers are professional enough to handle this and American soldiers aren't is really a slap in the face."[47]

Faced with this mass of evidence, attitudes in the military establishment were slowly thawing, with probably its biggest name, former Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman Colin Powell, who had originally supported DADT, coming out in support of its repeal in 2009. “The policy and the law that came about in 1993, I think, was correct for the time,” he said. But, he added, “Sixteen years have now gone by, and I think a lot has changed with respect to attitudes within our country, and therefore I think this is a policy and a law that should be reviewed.”[48] John M. Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1993 to 1997, and formerly a staunch supporter of DADT, wrote an op-ed in the New York Times in which he described a similar Damascene conversion. “I now believe that if gay men and lesbians served openly in the United States, they would not undermine the military efficacy of the armed forces,” he concluded. But unlike Powell he subtly revealed the real reason for his change of heart. “Our military has been stretched thin by our deployments in the Middle East,” he wrote, adding “we must welcome the service of any American who is willing and able to do the job.”[49] It was, in other words, a numbers game. Gays would get their rights: but only because it was too costly to keep them out. Although happy with the sea change, the gay community was not fooled as to the reasons for their newfound acceptance. “Now that the Army needs recruits for a violent, unpopular war, we are more welcome,” wrote Andrew Hiller in a bitter letter to the New York Times in response to Shalikashvili’s article.[50] “It is more apparent than ever before that, as we conduct a global war on terror and face tremendous personnel shortages, that the ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ law is undermining our military readiness,” chimed Democrat Representative Martin Meehan (D-MA), who introduced a bill to repeal DADT.[51] In the Bush administration’s order of priorities, a commitment to bigotry seems to have ranked pretty high, but meeting army recruitment targets was even more important. Money was also a factor. It was calculated in a 2005 GAO report that the DADT policy had cost the military 9,488 service members since 1993 with 322 of them highly skilled linguists the military could ill afford to lose (like Bleu Copas).[52] In fact, 757 of them were deemed “critical.” The cost of training a soldier is between $90,000 and $150,000. For this reason, the SLDN didn’t take any particular joy in the figures from the War on Terror. “We don’t necessarily recognize it as a success,” said Maldonado. “During a time of war, when the military needs men and women to fight in Afghanistan and Iraq, lesbians and gays deserve basic rights because they are among the frontline defending our country. But during times of peace when threats are not proximate dismissals under DADT increase."

But what should have been more concerning for Powell and Shalikashvili than all this was that the DADT policy had created a climate of rampant homophobia in the US military during the War on Terror. The Pentagon's own inspector general released a report in 2009 which showed the horrendous treatment being meted out to gay service members and the climate of fear in which many lived. It found that "offensive comments about homosexuals were commonplace and the majority believed these offensive comments were tolerated to some extent within the military."[53] The secrecy necessitated by the DADT policy meant many were targeted by McCarthyite-style witch-hunts. A full 40 percent of soldiers "felt they had witnessed, or been a target of, harassment for perceived homosexuality." Eighty percent said they had heard offensive speech, derogatory names, jokes, or remarks about homosexuals in the last twelve months. Even more—85 percent—thought this abuse was tolerated by the military brass. "This behavior is not acceptable and will not be tolerated in the military," said a Pentagon spokesman. "We need to do more work on this policy," he added, but didn't blame DADT explicitly. SLDN did. A report it authored documented 968 cases of anti-gay harassment—including murder and assault—in the period from February 1999 to February 2000, an increase of 142 percent on the previous year. As the military was opened up to extremists and gangs, this hit an all-time-high level. The alleged Wikileaks source, Bradley Manning, was one gay soldier who reported being a victim of the rampant abuse during the War on Terror—bullying that may have been a factor in his alleged whistle-blowing. "It took them a while, but they started figuring me out, making fun of me, mocking me, harassing me, heating up with one or two physical attacks," Manning wrote to his friend on a chat website. He continued, "The army took me, a web dev, threw me into a rigid schedule, removed me from my digital self. The army . . . threw me in the forests of Missouri for 10 weeks with an old M-16, Reagan-era load-bearing equipment and 50 twanging people hailing from places like Texas, Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi . . . joy. What the hell did I put myself through?" It was a good question. Independent journalist Dahr Jamail, who did much important work on the subject, believed that homophobia had in fact become the worst kind of discrimination in the military during the War on Terror. “Homophobia arguably manifests itself in the worst form of discrimination in the military, surpassing even racism,” he wrote.

> Instead of enabling recruits to vanquish their prejudices and strengthening the individual and the collective spirit, all military training seems to be geared towards invoking the darkest elements in human nature—fear, hatred, pettiness, insecurity and similar aberrations. Under normal conditions, such an orientation legitimizes unacceptable behavior; under harsh and hostile conditions, it makes beasts of men. It is immaterial whether one is at the perpetrating end or the receiving end of unjust behavior. Of greater significance is the general air of violence and inequality that gets normalized in the process.[54]

It wasn’t just homosexuals, either. The kind of Christian fundamentalism expressed by General Pace’s comments about homosexuality’s “immorality” was prevalent across the military brass, and meant other groups were marginalized as well. Religiosity was increasingly prevalent in the military as it provided a glue to keep together all the disparate groups the loosening of regulations had allowed in, and was abused for this purpose. In 2008, Specialist Jeremy Hall sued the DOD for its “discrimination” against atheists because of the unconstitutional definition of the US military as a “Christian Army.” He revealed a culture of proselytizing among the commanders and soldiers which put atheists in an invidious position. “They don’t trust you because they think you are unreliable and might break, since you don’t have God to rely on,” he said.[55] “The message is, ‘It’s a Christian nation, and you need to recognize that.’” The accusations in the lawsuit were shocking. “Immediately after plaintiff made it known he would decline to join hands and pray, he was confronted, in the presence of other military personnel, by the senior ranking . . . staff sergeant who asked plaintiff why he did not want to pray, whereupon plaintiff explained because he is an atheist,” it read.[56] “The staff sergeant asked plaintiff what an atheist is and plaintiff responded it meant that he (plaintiff) did not believe in God. This response caused the staff sergeant to tell plaintiff that he would have to sit elsewhere for the Thanksgiving dinner. Nonetheless, plaintiff sat at the table in silence and finished his meal.”

Civil Rights Struggle

As momentum gathered pace and an increasing number of public figures showed support, the gay rights movement found a new hero in the Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama. He took it on as one of his flagship issues and wrote an open letter to the LGBT community promising the repeal of DADT. "I'm running for President to build an America that lives up to our founding promise of equality for all—a promise that extends to our gay brothers and sisters," he wrote. "It's wrong to have millions of Americans living as second-class citizens in this nation. And I ask for your support in this election so that together we can bring about real change for all LGBT Americans."[57] But halfway through his term he still had not come through on the promise and the movement turned against him. During one of his speeches in April 2010, the president received an angry response from disgruntled activists from GetEQUAL, an LGBT rights group. "What about 'don't ask, don't tell'?" one protester shouted, to which Obama replied: "We are going to do that."[58] Former army sergeant Darren Manzella had already written an impassioned letter to the new president as part of Stories from the Frontlines: Letters to President Barack Obama, a new media campaign launched to highlight the need for more presidential leadership in the fight to repeal DADT. "I served two tours of duty in the Middle East in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom as a Soldier in the United States Army. I was promoted to sergeant, was a team leader of a medical squad, and conducted over 100 twelve-hour patrols in the streets of Baghdad, treating wounds and evacuating casualties of sniper fire and roadside bombs," he wrote. "But, today, instead of protecting my fellow Americans, I sit working in a university development office because I was discharged under DADT."[59] Depending on your point of view, Manzella had been either extremely foolhardy or extremely brave. In 2008, he took time out from his duties as a medical liaison specialist with his division in Kuwait to appear on CBS's flagship 60 Minutes program. He was on his second deployment to the region after serving in a medical field artillery unit in Baghdad in 2005 and receiving a combat medal for giving treatment under enemy fire. Despite his stellar credentials, Manzella was aware that he was still an outsider in the army, not because of his dedication, patriotism, or competence, but thanks to his sexuality. In the thirteen-minute section of the program Manzella talked openly, without permission, about being gay. He told CBS that he had taken his boyfriend out with his army pals and painted a picture of a military that had come to accept gay members for who they were. Nothing happened in the aftermath. But he was eventually the target of another malicious anonymous email campaign that instructed him to tone down his "ostentatious" behavior. He decided to consult his commanding officer who told him that for the crime of telling the truth he would have to report Manzella to his superiors. “I had to go see my battalion commander, who read me my rights,” he said. “What a Catch-22. You go and tell your lieutenant the truth and now you violated the army’s rule.” True to his trailblazing attitude, Manzella held nothing back in the investigation, providing photos of him with AJ, his boyfriend, including pictures of them kissing. But despite all this, Manzella was told to resume work in the military. “‘The closest thing that I was given by my superiors was, ‘I don’t care if you’re gay or not,’” Manzella said. Even after the CBS show aired on national television Manzella was allowed to stay in the military. Nevertheless, in 2008 he was eventually discharged as the case became too embarrassing for the military to ignore. But they had wanted to ignore it—and there were thousands more Manzellas serving openly in the US military.

Things heated up in September 2010 when the DADT policy was ruled unconstitutional by a judge in California. A lawsuit had been brought by the Log Cabin Republicans which moved to order an injunction against the policy. In conclusion US District Court Judge Virginia A. Phillips wrote forcefully:

> The Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell Act infringes the fundamental rights of United States servicemembers in many ways . . . The Act denies homosexuals serving in the Armed Forces the right to enjoy “intimate conduct” in their personal relationships. The Act denies them the right to speak about their loved ones while serving their country in uniform; it punishes them with discharge for writing a personal letter, in a foreign language, to a person of the same sex with whom they shared an intimate relationship before entering military service; it discharges them for including information in a personal communication from which an unauthorized reader might discern their homosexuality. In order to justify the encroachment on these rights, Defendants faced the burden at trial of showing the Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell Act was necessary to significantly further the Government’s important interests in military readiness and unit cohesion. Defendants failed to meet that burden. Thus, Plaintiff, on behalf of its members, is entitled to judgment in its favor on the first claim in its First Amended Complaint for violation of the substantive due process rights guaranteed under the Fifth Amendment.[60]

At the same time, the movement had found another brave and eloquent spokesman in the form of Lieutenant Dan Choi, from the Army National Guard, who had served bravely in Iraq and was a graduate of West Point before being discharged under DADT. Choi was particularly critical of the survey the Obama administration had set up to gauge military attitudes to homosexuality, which he saw as another betrayal on the president's part. "That the commander in chief [was] the first [from a] racial minority to achieve that rank and that position was a signifying moment for all of us, whether we're racial minorities, whether we're sexual minorities, whether we're American citizens or not even yet American citizens, it was an absolute moment of vindication for a lot of people," he said. But, he added, "Nobody ever polls the soldiers on whether we should go to war or not. Nobody ever says, 'What do you think about your commander in chief being African-American?'"[61] Choi was adamant about taking advantage of the judge's verdict and the obvious fact that the policy was becoming untenable for the military. In October 2010, he went to reenlist in the marines at Times Square in New York City, trailed by a sizeable media contingent. He took advantage of a new Pentagon statement that "recruiters have been given guidance, and they will process applications for applicants who admit they are openly gay or lesbian."[62] There was increasingly nothing the military could do in the face of this tidal wave of activism. In a stunning victory for the gay community in the US and around the world, seventeen years of struggle to get DADT repealed finally came to a head in December 2010 when Congress passed a law repealing the policy. "No longer will our country be denied the service of patriotic Americans who are forced to leave the military, no matter their bravery or zeal, because they happen to be gay," said President Obama as he signed it into law.[63] It was a bittersweet victory: a wonderful civil rights triumph, but one that would have been impossible without the military's desperate need for troops allowing homosexuals to serve honorably and basically openly for the first time. Obama admitted as much, commenting that the repeal will be introduced "in a way that only strengthens our military readiness" (read: more troops). In the end, homosexual service members got their rights, but it took risking their lives in ever-greater numbers in wars started by an administration that believed their sexuality was a moral abomination. The Bush administration's lack of principle across the board had ironically laid the ground for the one positive thing to come out of America's Irregular Army.

The Aftermath

The story didn't end there, however. President Obama rapidly moved from hero to villain after the bill was signed, coming under intense pressure from gay civil rights groups about the languid pace at which the repeal of DADT was proceeding. Months on from the repeal, gay service members were still being discharged under the policy as all branches of the military remained in the "training" phase aimed at preparing existing service members for the change in policy. For many gay soldiers the "integration process" was bogus because they were already in there serving openly. The SLDN started a clock on their website to count every second that has passed since the repeal was signed until it is finally enforced. "I find it offensive that it takes nearly a year to make the transition," Aubrey Sarvis, executive director of the SLDN, told me. Many straight troops knew already who was gay or lesbian within their platoon or company so this was not news, which made the delays even harder to understand.

The chorus of criticism from gay groups of Obama and his administration reached fever pitch when the President and his wife refused to invite Servicemembers United, the largest gay military group by members, to an event at the White House in early 2011. "It was the first military event at the White House since repeal and we asked for a representative to be included," said Alexander Nicholson, executive director of Servicemembers United. "First they didn't think of it themselves, but when we pointed out and asked to have a representative they specifically refused, which was disappointing and puzzling," he told me. Many put this down to political calculus on Obama's part as he tried to leverage his positions on the economy and health care. But snubs like this, alongside the fact it had taken him two years to come through on the campaign pledge, turned the tide of popularity against the president. Criticisms of the fact that the repeal did not go far enough started in earnest. The final repeal, for example, did not include the non-discrimination mandate clause, which would have made gay service members a protected class and had profound legal ramifications. If a gay soldier is discriminated against based on their sexuality in terms of a promotion or another injustice, they still do not have the venue to complain using equal opportunity legislation as someone with a religious or racial complaint would. Without that in place, a new president who wanted to reinstate DADT would have authority to do it. Feasibly there could be an administrative directive from a future White House that curtails open service policy after certification or outright reverses it. In essence, the repeal bill took away the law enacted in 1993, but before that the gay ban was completely regulatory. With the 1993 law gone, the issue was back in regulatory space, which, while most expected the Pentagon to continue an open service policy, left open the possibility that in a decade or so, with troop needs back to being manageable, they could adopt a discriminatory policy again. “Given the doublespeak of the White House, its supportive but never too supportive, people are skeptical, nobody is 100 percent trusting of the fact we are done yet. Everybody is waiting,” added Nicholson.

The Defense of Marriage Act, or DOMA—which the Obama administration had pledged to stop defending in court—also continued to draw ire because it still meant that while gay people can die for their country their spouses or significant others would not be honored in the same way as spouses of their straight colleagues, or receive the same benefits. There are even Republican groups pushing for the Obama administration to go further. “The biggest criticism for us is that President Obama has refused to suspend the discharge proceedings as the certification is taking place,” said Clarke Cooper, executive director of the Log Cabin Republicans, who served openly in Iraq and was later appointed by George W. Bush as a diplomat. In many ways, the military appeared more effusive than the Obama administration about the changes, perhaps because they had seen it operating during the War on Terror with no real drawbacks. General James Amos, a Marine Corps commandant, had been against the repeal initially, but told Congress in the midst of the training process that the repeal was going forward with few problems. “I’ve been looking for issues, but honestly we haven’t seen it,” he said.[64] “There hasn’t been the recalcitrant pushback. We haven’t seen the anxiety over it from the forces in the field.” The surprise for progressives was that the only anxiety about it was coming from the White House.

Epilogue: Indiscriminate Trust

On the careful choice of soldiers depends the welfare of the Republic, and the very essence of the Roman Empire and its power is so inseparably connected with this charge, that it is of the highest importance not to be entrusted indiscriminately.

Flavius Vegetius Renatus, fifth century[1]

You go to war with the Army you have. They're not the Army you might want or wish to have at a later time.

Secretary of Defense, Donald Rumsfeld, 2004[2]

Sometime in the early fifth century an aristocratic Roman thinker with no first-hand experience of war sat down to write what would be become the most important military rulebook in history. The short tract, Concerning Military Matters,[3] ripped up conventional ideas about military affairs and the art of war, casting a long shadow over the following millennium of fighting. Its lessons were varied, ranging from instructions on how to manage raw and undisciplined troops to notes on legionary musical etiquette. But many were also timeless—centuries later in the war-ravaged Middle Ages the rulebook was still treated like gospel by a rogue's gallery of despots and their generals. Its author was Flavius Vegetius Renatus, a self-effacing young man who regarded his work as a clarion call to an empire of awesome power but with problems coming into sharp focus on the horizon—particularly, Vegetius believed, concerning the military. He addressed his preface for the first book directly to Emperor Valentinian with typical coyness: "I do not presume to offer this work to Your Majesty from a supposition that you are not acquainted with every part of its contents," he assured his master.[4] While his humble tone and faith in his leader's intelligence can perhaps be admired, it would prove to be a wrongheaded assumption. Over the next century, Vegetius's revolutionary lessons on how to run a successful military machine would be spurned by the leaders of the world's most powerful empire, an oversight that would prove fatal as the Roman colossus fell from a position of unrivalled global dominance to a barely recognizable shell power. It was the biggest fall from grace history has seen to date.

In his classic work The Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire, the eighteenth-century historian Edward Gibbon describes the empire's pinnacle in glowing prose: "In the second century of the Christian era, the Empire of Rome comprehended the fairest part of the earth, and the most civilised portion of mankind," he writes. "The frontiers of that extensive monarchy were guarded by ancient renown and disciplined valour."[5] Yet from this redoubtable position, just three centuries later in 410, Rome, the imperial capital, the symbol of all that was great and good in the empire, was sacked by the "barbarians" who had been its slaves just decades earlier. Historians have spent the last millennium trying to work out why and how this happened with such speed, but despite the amount of painstaking research undertaken there remains significant debate about why the fall came when it did. "Although the topic has been popular, and myriad reasons have been offered to explain Rome's fall, no consensus has emerged, and historians of the twentieth century have multiplied the variety of explanations many times over," writes one historian.[6] Explanations range from the insidious influence of Christianity from the first century on, to a generalized rupture in the moral fabric of Roman society. But one strain of thought stands out about all others —the military explanation. Vegetius was a pioneer in this regard. In his book, he observed that "so many defeats" as the Romans suffered at the time can "only be imputed" to the "careless choice of our levies."[7] He feared that the careless attention paid to stocking the fighting force with upright and well-trained warriors could prove the death of the empire he loved. He was further alarmed at the "inclination so prevalent among the better sort in preferring the civil posts of government to the profession of arms."[8] At the Battle of Châlons, at around the time Vegetius was writing, Rome's military had been shown up as a shadow of its former self. The enemy commander Attila had the gall to inform his troops that Rome's warriors were nothing but a ragtag army of nonentities. It was an unthinkable charge. "The dust of battle overwhelms them while they fight in close formation under a screen of protective shields," he taunted as his soldiers laughed.[9] The descent culminated when the imperial city was sacked for the first time in 800 years, as one of the barbarian Germanic tribes that had been tormenting the empire, the Visigoths, stormed into Rome and looted for three days.

As he looked back centuries later, Gibbon saw the same trajectory as Vegetius. “In the purer ages of the Commonwealth,” he wrote, “the use of arms was reserved for those ranks who had a country to love, a property to defend, and some share in enacting those laws which it was their interest, as well as duty, to maintain.”[10] Gradually, though, things changed. “The common soldiers, like the mercenary troops of modern Europe,” writes Gibbon, soon became “drawn from the meanest, and very frequently from the most profligate, of mankind.”[11] The Roman military had also opened its doors to the conquered enemies—a process referred to in the field as “barbarization,” which allowed mercenaries to receive Roman largesse in exchange for fighting the elite’s increasingly avaricious wars. The new additions created endless problems for a military that had been the envy of the world. As historian Arthur Ferrill, author of The Fall of the Roman Empire: The Military Explanation, writes, “Despite the impact of barbarization, Roman forces continued to fight according to traditional Roman tactics, yet those tactics, previously so superior, seemed absurd to the barbarians of the fifth century.”[12] It had a significant and detrimental impact on the ability of the army to do its job. “To fight effectively in close order, troops require intensive drill and rigorous discipline,” says Ferrill. “Romans of the fifth century apparently maintained the old formations but abandoned the necessary training. As a result they combined the worst features of the Roman and barbarian styles of fighting.”[13] The importance of the “careful choice of levies” has continued to occupy all the most renowned military thinkers. Sun Tzu wrote in The Art of War that one of the ways “in which a ruler can bring misfortune upon his army” is by “employing the officers of his army without discrimination.”[14] While Nicolo Machiavelli warned in his classic The Prince, “If a prince bases the defense of his state on mercenaries he will never achieve stability or security. For mercenaries are disunited, thirsty for power, undisciplined, and disloyal; they are brave among their friends and cowards before the enemy.”[15] Both books were apparently favorites of American military planners before and during the War on Terror.

False Prophet

History doesn’t repeat itself exactly, but it often resonates and in the psyche of the country at large 9/11 assumed similar proportions to the sacking of Rome centuries earlier. Unlike the destruction of Rome, however, it wasn’t a verdict on the military weakness of the country—the US still had thousands of bases around the world and its defense budget was nearly as much as that of the rest of the world combined. But it did precipitate the War on Terror which, this book has shown, saw the decline and "barbarization" of the US military with the inclusion of domestic "undesirables" on a scale comparable to the later years of Rome. In fact, the American military's deterioration has been considerably quicker and more dangerous, and the failures in Afghanistan and Iraq could foreshadow the diminution of American power along Roman lines. There has been a pervasive feeling since the War on Terror and financial crisis that power is slipping away. "American Decline" is now a vogue topic across the media and academia. But it may not be terminal. In Vegetius's second address to the emperor he made a plea: "The expense of keeping up good or bad troops is the same," he wrote, "but it depends wholly on You, most August Emperor, to recover the excellent discipline of the ancients to correct the abuses of later times. This is a reformation the advantages of which will be equally felt by ourselves and our posterity."[16] He could easily have been addressing US President Barack Obama in January 2009 on his ascension to power. Like the Roman Emperor, Obama was inheriting a military broken by the "abuses of later times"—or, more specifically, by the Bush administration. Its troops were scarred, many mentally unstable and untreated, ravaged by two wars and the subsequent occupations which the Pentagon was ill-prepared for. Countless families across the nation were (and are) dealing with loved ones who have changed forever, while the military had reached the lowest point in its history. "We're on the brink," said Thomas White, former Secretary of the Army, earlier in the War on Terror. "We are in a situation where we are grossly overdeployed, and it is unlike any other period in the 229-year history of the Army. We have never conducted a sustained combat operation with a volunteer force, with a force that we have to compete in the job market to hire every year."[17] It was a task without historical precedent and it fell to Obama to fix for posterity what had been so disastrously broken. "I thought by the end of Vietnam . . . we had broadly destroyed the US Army," White added.[18] "The non-commissioned officer leadership had vanished. Indiscipline rates were way, way up. We needed a complete rebuilding of the force from bottom to top. And that's precisely what we engaged ourselves in for the next 20 years or so." The US military establishment now has to engage itself for the next decade (and probably longer) doing the same thing.

The auguries for the Obama presidency were good. Despite all the public-relations hype surrounding his election campaign, in the military there were real reasons to hold out hope for change. As we have seen, Obama was forceful in denouncing the use of veterans as guinea pigs to test new drugs on. He had come out equally strongly against the discriminatory Don't Ask, Don't Tell policy on homosexuals. He had backed the post-9/11 GI Bill, proposed by Jim Webb, which would pay out $78 billion in education benefits to veterans who had served in the military after September 11. John McCain, his presidential opponent, was against it. Obama's soaring rhetoric was even sweeter. "What this new generation of veterans must know is this," he opined. "Our nation's commitment to all who wear its uniform is a sacred trust that is as old as our republic itself. It is one that, as President, I consider a moral obligation to uphold."[19] Obama announced a new twenty-first-century Veterans Health Administration which would make it easier for veterans with PTSD to receive the medical benefits they deserved, while the GI Bill would also open up educational opportunities and job training to those coming back from Iraq and Afghanistan. It seemed he was aware that if the government continued to get the reintegration of its soldiers back into civilian society wrong, it would have disastrous effects for America for decades to come.

But it didn't take long for cracks to appear in the shiny veneer. Obama had originally opposed the war in Iraq and his campaign had been built partly on his ironclad commitment to end the war. "As a candidate for this office, I pledged I would end this war. As President, that is what I am doing," he said in August 2010. "We have brought home more than 90,000 troops since I took office. We have closed or turned over to Iraq hundreds of bases. In many parts of the country, Iraqis have already taken the lead for security."[20] But, in fact, many of the Bush administration's most destructive policies were simply kept in place. The final 40,000 non-combat US troops were brought home in 2011, but many called it the privatization of the occupation, as security contractor numbers continued to rise. At the same time, Obama ratcheted up operations in the other front in the War on Terror: within a year of his inauguration he announced a "surge" in Afghanistan which would increase troop levels by 30,000, keeping up the pressure on the broken military. In 2011, just 34 percent of veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan believed the wars had been worth fighting. At the same time, both veterans and active-duty personnel were less likely to approve of Obama than the rest of the population.

The Corporate Model Wins Out

The wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have been the longest combat operations in American history. Millions of lives have been destroyed in the process and whole societies traumatized. The project ended up as a humanitarian catastrophe for the occupied populations but, contrary to popular belief, it wasn't a failure for the ideologues who started the conflagrations. Rumsfeld's vision of an eviscerated civilian military was, in the end, and at great human cost, realized. Trying to keep the army small when the wars demanded large numbers of troops meant the military acted more and more like a corporation; unfortunately it was a corporation without enough employees. Morten G. Ender at the Military Academy in West Point, New York, put it this way: "What's new is the all volunteer force. The military now has to rely on the corporate model. If people don't come to your business you have to compromise your standards or lower your expectations."[21] In power, Obama ended up using more private security contractors than even the Bush administration had, despite early concerns about what journalist Jeremy Scahill calls their "unconstitutional" use. In truth it was impossible to do without them: the broken US military could not long stand on its own two feet. The fact that its armed forces have become US military Inc. should be extremely worrying for the American public, for the military planners whose concern is projecting power around the world, and for those who may be next on the receiving end of their bombs.

It is clear from the stories in this book that the military's drop in standards unleashed a significant tranche of mentally unstable, extremist, and violent individuals upon the Iraqi and Afghan populations. Many of the most sickening of the atrocities committed by US service members—from the Abu Ghraib torture scandal to the Mahmudiyah massacre—were directly related to the loosening of standards. It might be a felon who had received a "moral waiver" but couldn't shake off his criminal impulses, or a neo-Nazi granted a newfound freedom in the military. It could be a drunk soldier who picked up his weapon in the middle of a binge and went out to take pot-shots at the locals. This in itself has profound implications for the pretext of the whole War on Terror, billed as a moral crusade to bring democracy to the benighted Middle East. Indeed, it shifts the entire frame through which we should look at the whole venture. For modern military occupations, destruction of the occupied society is usually de rigueur. But the evidence strongly suggests that a military rife with alcoholics and gang-bangers is even more likely to grievously harm the society it occupies. The Irregular Army also ended up as the largest anthropological experiment in history, with US service members as the guinea pigs. In 1992, as Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney had said, "The military is not a social welfare agency . . . We aren't there to run social experiments. We are there to fight and win wars," but under his administration's watch a "social experiment" is what it became.[22] It bought together groups that would never come across each other in their everyday lives. Neo-Nazis from Iowa broke bread with gang-bangers from Chicago in Baghdad, and alcoholics supped "hajji juice" with the mentally ill in Fallujah. It engendered weird alliances. In November 2010, for example, it was reported that Mexican drug cartels were enlisting white supremacists to smuggle illegal drugs across the border.[23] Members of both of groups had been enlisted in the military in considerable numbers during the War on Terror. Did the relationship begin there? The military's recruitment policy will contribute to social degeneration back home for decades to come. From the mentally scarred soldiers who are refused treatment (many of whom end up in the criminal justice system) to heavily trained gang-bangers stalking the streets of US cities, the "barbarization" of the US armed forces will be a theme that returns again and again as it touches on so many of the ills plaguing US society.

The FBI reported that it had carried out over 14 million background checks on Americans wanting to purchase weapons and explosives in 2009, up 10 percent from 12.7 million the year before. That represents more guns than the number held by the biggest militaries in the world—combined.[24] As I write this, Jared Loughner, a delusional young loner, has just murdered six people in Arizona and nearly killed Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords with a semi-automatic weapon. It has since transpired that Loughner had tried to join the military in late 2008—and his experience is instructive. He was refused entry, which would seem to contradict the thesis of the Irregular Army. In truth, it was a demonstration of all the military shortcomings outlined above. Loughner passed the ASVAB easily and was soon in one of the Military Entrance Processing Stations (MEPS)—which gauges recruits' applicability—where he was asked the standard question of whether he had "used illegal drugs or abused prescription drugs."[25] He answered honestly that he used marijuana, and according to the military they barred him on this basis. But he could have lied about it—as thousands of others had done in the War on Terror and before. He could also have been the recipient of a "medical waiver" or "moral waiver" even if he had a conviction. In other words, had he been smart he could have gotten in with no problem and been sent off to war. "It's bizarre," a military official said. "I certainly wouldn't go through the whole process only to say, 'Hey, I've been smoking marijuana for the past couple of years.'"[26] There are undoubtedly many other Loughners who were smarter and went on to serve—maybe some of them appear in this book. Over the coming decade, with military training and access to weapons, they will be stalking the streets of both the US and the Middle East. America will pay for this in the blood of its own citizens as will the subject populations of the countries its military occupies. A warning shot was fired in March 2011 when the FBI arrested Kevin William Harpham, a thirty-six-year-old member of the neo-Nazi National Alliance, in Spokane, Washington, on suspicion of planting a bomb at a Martin Luther King Day celebration which if detonated would have killed hundreds of people. Harpham had served in the US army for two years in the mid-1990s.

Lies Into Iraq

But pointing the finger is too easy. We have to take some blame ourselves, as we were as indiscriminate in our trust in our leaders as they were with their choice of soldiers. As the wars went on, we believed their crocodile tears when American troops died. We bought their soaring rhetoric about their commitment to service members, when in fact they were often cutting veterans' access to benefits and health care. It was just a continuation of the lies we were told to take us into war in the first place. For people like Charlie P. Gaffney Jr., who picked up a gun again at the age of forty in an effort to help bring democracy to the people of Afghanistan and Iraq, these lies ended their lives. While the Bush administration cast the invasion as a "liberation" to "free the Iraqi people from the tyranny of Saddam Hussein," the uncomfortable fact that during the 1980s the US had supported Hussein was scrubbed from history. Declassified files show that the Reagan administration and its special Middle East envoy, Donald Rumsfeld, had done "little to stop Iraq developing weapons of mass destruction in the 1980s, even though they were fully aware that Saddam was using chemical weapons 'almost daily' against Iran," reports the Guardian. The declassified documents detail how Reagan and Rumsfeld had allowed the export of biological weapons, including anthrax, ingredients for chemical weapons, and cluster bombs. In 1983, the then Secretary of State George Shultz received intelligence of "almost daily use" of chemical weapons by Iraq. A mere twenty-five days after this information was received, Reagan gave a secret order allowing the administration to do "whatever was necessary and legal" to help Iraq win the war over Iran. In December of that year, Rumsfeld met Saddam in Baghdad and stated the United States' desire to restore diplomatic relations. This support and flow of arms continued long after the end of the Iran–Iraq war, right up until the first Gulf War in 1990—even after Saddam had shelled the Kurdish town of Halabja in March 1988 with gas bombs, killing an estimated 5,000 civilians and maiming thousands more.

The lie was no different in the UK. In December 2009 I was sent by my newspaper at the time, the Financial Times, down to the National Archives in Kew Gardens, London, to write a series of articles based on secret British state documents, which were then being released under the thirty-year disclosure rule. I would be viewing documents from 1979, the same year Saddam Hussein became president of Iraq in a bloody coup. I was particularly interested in how the British had viewed the event, and reading the reactions of the British ambassador to the coup was an eye-opening experience. Saddam became president in July 1979 in what the ambassador described as "the first smooth transfer of power in Iraq since 1958," when a group of army officers had overthrown the monarchy.[27] The ambassador noted, however, what this "smooth transfer" had involved: Within the first twenty-four hours of Saddam's rule, "21 prominent Iraqis, including five members of the ruling Revolutionary Command Council, [were] executed." Britain was confident of Saddam's ability to crush dissent. "Strong-arm methods may be needed to steady the ship," wrote a Foreign Office official. "Saddam will not flinch." A Foreign Office briefing said Saddam was "personable in appearance" and wore "well-cut clothes, reputedly London-made." He was said to elicit "fear mixed with grudging admiration" and gave "an impression in conversation of quiet but determined concentration, unusual in the Ba'ath leadership."

The archives included a document sent by the embassy to London that detailed a day in the new president's life. "It is not often we are permitted a glimpse into the personal lives of Iraq's leaders," said the letter to the Foreign Office, "so by way of introduction, I enclose a touching account of a day in the life of President Saddam Hussein." Badly translated from Arabic, it read: "The early morning workers often exchange tales of how President Hussein surprised them at work site, how he chatted with them, smiled to them or asked them and listened to them . . . Tales full with love and admiration growing day after day in their hearts." On January 1, 2010, the day the thirty-year embargo was up and the newspapers printed our articles, I went to my local newsagent and checked all the other papers nervously to see if I had missed any big stories buried in the documents. Luckily, there were none. Everyone looked to have found the same sort of things—except, funnily enough, the one about Saddam Hussein. My article in the Financial Times (headline: "Saddam Was Well-regarded by British") was the only one that even referenced the documents related to Iraq. It was an example of our deeply biased reporters ignoring the ugly truth of what our government stood and stands for in the world. The British had, in fact, been honing their methods of domination for decades—methods copied by the US. They were spelled out quite clearly by Lord Curzon who, when installing King Faisal in Iraq in 1921, wrote that the British need an "Arab facade ruled and administered under British guidance and controlled by a native Mohammedan and, as far as possible, by an Arab staff . . . There should be no actual incorporation of the conquered territory in the dominions of the conqueror, but the absorption may be veiled by such constitutional fictions as a protectorate, a sphere of influence, a buffer state and so on."[28] Nothing has changed in the twenty-first century.

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan also had profound effects on the UK military, the only other country in the coalition fighting the War on Terror whose armed forces were stretched even close to those of the US, and the most generous partner in terms of providing troops. A high of 9,500 British service members were deployed to Afghanistan in 2009, while the Iraq war saw an initial force of 46,000. So far, 179 UK soldiers have been killed in Iraq and 407 in Afghanistan.[29] For a country with a population a fifth of that of the US, it was a substantial commitment and the biggest military operation since the end of World War Two. The UK military experienced some but not all of the problems that Rumsfeld and the Pentagon presided over in the US, and the differences are instructive. For example, there have been very few reports of a proliferation of neo-Nazis and white supremacists in the British military, although members of the fascist British National Party have joined up. Little substantial investigative work has been conducted on the matter and it remains an open but worrying question. The leader of the BNP, Nick Griffin, has said that his party is popular among British soldiers. "I'm the one who talks to the families of young squaddies and large numbers of ex-servicemen and they all say that almost everyone at the coalface, fighting in Afghanistan, vote for the British National Party," he said in 2009.[30] But gangs are considerably less prevalent in the UK and their members have not been enlisted to any worrying degree in its military. Likewise the rules on recruiting criminals were not tweaked to swell the ranks.

Where the UK military did suffer was in the susceptibility of its troops to alcohol and drugs and the concomitant problems of PTSD. There was a fivefold increase in UK soldiers failing drug tests in the period 2002–8, although their drug of choice was different from that of their American colleagues.[31] On the whole it was cocaine and ecstasy, with a move in later years to mephedrone, which is cheaper and more easily accessible. In 2006 the Daily Telegraph revealed that the armed forces had in fact scrapped, in secret, its policy of automatic dismissal for those caught using Class A drugs. The Ministry of Defence claims, like the DOD, that it doesn't tolerate any drug use, but by 2008 it had allowed 1,300 drug users to stay in the military.[32] Alcohol is not strictly banned by the UK military and it developed into a big problem during the War on Terror—one in seven soldiers reported being driven to alcohol by their experience in war.[33] PTSD also became a big problem for UK soldiers, though dwarfed by comparison with the US. One study found that American soldiers were seven times more likely to get PTSD than their British counterparts. UK rates for PTSD stayed at around 3–4 percent during the War on Terror, compared to 30 percent in the US military. "PTSD seems not to be a 'universal stress reaction', arising in all societies across all time," wrote Neil Greenberg, author of the study. "Evidence from both world wars suggests that the ways in which service personnel communicate distress is culturally determined and that the development of PTSD may be one more phase in the evolving picture of human reaction to adversity."[34] Perhaps the more important difference was the lack of health and rehabilitation services available to US troops as the military unraveled—something the UK didn't experience on the same level. Likewise, German soldiers in Afghanistan had PTSD levels at 2 percent for returning soldiers.[35]

In terms of the general physical condition of UK troops, the picture was not pretty: the only soldier whose death was officially linked to obesity was British. In 2009 a leaked army memo complained that thousands of British troops could not be deployed to Afghanistan because they were too fat.[36] Operational readiness, the memo noted, was being undermined by the lack of fitness of British troops, who are required to do a minimum of just two hours of exercise per week. Unlike in the US, there's no proof they stopped kicking out overweight troops. Homosexuals were already allowed to serve in the UK military before the War on Terror began, so that engendered no change, and tellingly no problems either. Foreigners—notably in the form of Nepalese Gurkhas—had fought in the British military since the time of the empire. The issue attracted a high-profile campaign when the British government refused to allow Gurkha veterans to live in the UK after service—a controversy similar to that which arose when the government had refused to let Iraqi translators and other workers in danger settle in the UK. The Gurkhas were joined by others during the War on Terror, although the regulations were not changed to allow more of them into the UK. Figures released in 2009 show that one in ten new recruits to the army were born abroad, three times the number in 2000. In 2008–9, 1,320 service members born outside Britain joined the military, compared with 540 in 1999–2000.[37]

Heroes and Villains

The majority of this book (excepting the heroic civil rights victory for gay service members) will have been a depressing and a sobering read for patriotic Americans and those around the world concerned with human rights and decency. But it has also revealed a heroes gallery of lawmakers, activists, active-duty soldiers, and veterans who refused to accept the degrading treatment that has been meted out by the military brass and their colleagues in Washington. Henry Waxman was one member of Congress who stood up to highlight the outrageous proliferation of felons in the military, while Marty Meehan tried his damnedest to pass civil rights legislation that would allow gays to serve openly. They were widely traduced and attacked at the time. Active-duty troops included Justin Watt, who alerted his superiors to the Mahmudiyah massacre and risked his life in order to see justice done for the family involved. He was mocked and ignored by the military initially but kept his steel. Then there are the kids of Bushwick, Brooklyn, who have fought valiantly against the de facto conscription the Bush administration imposed on the poor children of America by allowing recruiters to take over their schools. Private First Class Bradley Manning, the alleged source of the Wikileaks cables and war logs, is another. So angered was he at being ignored by his senior officers when he told them about the illegal activity he saw, he thought he had to do something about it—and changed the course of history at the same time.

Unfortunately brave individuals like Manning have been the exception. There has been a concerted effort by the military brass and their political allies to ignore the problem or simply deny it even exists. In every case where the military acknowledged there had been a loosening of standards it was presented officially as a victory for democracy or civil rights—permitting older recruits, for example, confirms a commitment to non-discriminatory practices based on age. It was the same tactic as is used generally for US foreign policy: every action, by definition, has to be spun as altruistic. While finishing this book, the Wikileaks release of the Afghanistan and Iraq war logs gave the public an unprecedented look at the anatomy of those wars and the toll they had taken on civilians. I decided to check out the SIGACT ("significant activity") reports related to some of the events I was writing about. It became clear quite quickly that although a vital tool in revealing the true brutality the war inflicted on Iraqis, the reports did not come close to conveying the true horror of what had taken place. One of the distinctive features of US war-waging, as in Vietnam, is that specific massacres and murders are held up by the Pentagon as unfortunate exceptions, the transgressions of a few "crazy" lowlife troops. The perpetrators are then made an example of. In Iraq, those massacres were Haditha and Mahmudiyah (and in 2012 Panjwai district in Afghanistan). In Vietnam, after the investigative work by Seymour Hersh, it was My Lai (an "American tragedy" according to Time magazine). The great lie, then as now, is that these are the exceptions when in fact they are commonplace. Cold-blooded murder, taking pot-shots at the locals: it's all par for the course if you talk to veterans who have been at the sharp end of the conflict. In interviews published in the Nation magazine in 2007, veterans of Iraq described the true horror the invading army had inflicted on the civilian population. Chris Hedges and Laila Al-Arian, the interviewers, concluded that indiscriminate killings were "common," "often go unreported—and almost always go unpunished."[38] They were right. Even the atrocities that were reported had been initially hushed up by the US military.

Take the case of Lance Corporal Delano Holmes—who stabbed his Iraq colleague Private Hassin to death while on sentry duty. He received a joke sentence handed out by a farcical court-martial system, but typical of the justice afforded to what was viewed as just "collateral damage." How was the murder of Hassin reported in the log? One host nation soldier killed, it says. "Prior to an Iraqi guard post change . . . the Marine and the IA were arguing over the off-going soldier smoking in the post. Smoking is prohibited inside the post due to the enemy sniper threat," it begins, as if excusing what is to come. "The arguing changed to shoving each other at which time the oncoming Iraqi soldier arrived and joined in the shoving. The [redacted] of the off going IA was fired [redacted] times inside the post, at which time the Marine believing his life was threatened stabbed the off-going Iraqi soldier with a knife resulting in [redacted]."[39] But at the court-martial, the prosecutors said Holmes had fired Hassan's AK-47 afterwards to make what was a cold-blooded murder look like self-defense—the same lie reported by the SIGACT. In other words, the SIGACT is entirely misleading. The Wikileaks logs gave a glimpse of the horror, but only a glimpse. Behind every report, there was another world of truth obfuscated by the pared-down and tendentious military reportage. Often the truth looked more like that of the "kill team" in Afghanistan, whose reign of terror in Kandahar was made public in 2011. Twelve men were charged with the indiscriminate murder of civilians after they had posed for photos with the dead bodies. When one of the soldiers was asked by the judge what he had intended to do with the shootings, he replied: "The plan was to kill people." Some of them were also charged with staging killings to make it appear as if they had been defending themselves against Taliban assaults. It is safe to assume that many others got away with this tactic.

The reaction from the American public when such truths are revealed is always one of disgust, which is why the truth has to be kept from them. In 2004 about three-quarters of the US population believed it was not right to invade Iraq if it had no weapons of mass destruction or links to Al-Qaeda. But nearly 60 percent still believed Iraq had WMDs, or programs for them in development, and links to 9/11, thanks to the Bush administration propaganda (and a pliant media).[40] The national press parroted the lie that these wars needed to be undertaken for our own protection. The opposite was the case. A classified US intelligence report Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States revealed the huge effect the war in Iraq had on increasing Islamic radicalism and spreading it to a new generation of young Muslims who would now be more likely to attack Western targets. In Britain, a report by the Joint Terrorist Analysis Centre—composed of officials from MI5, MI6, Government Communications Headquarters, and the police—stated that "events in Iraq are continuing to act as motivation and a focus of a range of terrorist-related activity in the UK."[41] The amount of money spent in the twin occupations has also helped to bankrupt America. The esteemed economist Joseph Stiglitz has estimated that all-told the war in Iraq alone will end up costing in total $3 trillion.

I hope reading this book will rouse that anger, because the veterans and the occupied populations deserve the truth to come out at the very least. The FBI and other investigative bodies outside the US military—like the GAO—have been alive to the problems of the Irregular Army and done important work to address them. For the military itself, however, it has been too painful to look into the mirror; no one will ever know the number of personal tragedies on both sides this dereliction of duty has caused. It is a national and international scandal. The benefits of empire are always unequally distributed at home—benefits that come to the imperial country as a result of war and occupation are generally concentrated among the economic elite. In the US there remain very sharp differentials in income, and the polarization of wealth and poverty as a result of imperialism got worse during the War on Terror. When foreigners look at the US, they see the riches, but they tend not to see the other side. The recruitment for the Irregular Army preyed on this other side—the most vulnerable and poor Americans—while the financial benefits of their sacrifice filtered back to the rich and powerful.

Using the Military

The US is at a crossroads. After the trauma of September 11, the biggest ever attack on its homeland, it was taken on a dangerous, violent, and reckless journey by a group of nationalist extremists. It is getting sicker as the wars continue to consume the nation, but it's not terminal. With the will and fortitude of the American people, there can be a reckoning with the forces that have destroyed so many lives in both the US and the Middle East. According to some estimates, over a million Iraqis died as a result of the invasion, while Afghanistan is poorer than ever and sees little hope of redemption (we don't keep count of the number of people we kill). But as I write this at the turn of 2011, 4,408 American soldiers have been killed in Iraq since the invasion, and 1,339 have perished in Afghanistan, while all the issues raised in this book are alive as ever and continue to blight the US military. As we move on to new "theaters of conflict" like Iran we need to look unflinchingly at what we've done and who we've destroyed in process. The lives lost will be in vain unless the truth of what was done to both military service members and the occupied populations enters the historical record unvarnished. The people who did this to us, to them, must face their crimes and their victims: the veteran who has just committed suicide after being denied treatment for PTSD; the Afghan children murdered in their beds by drugged-up airmen; the next generation ravaged by military-trained gangs and neo-Nazis in American cities. And they must look into the mirror and accept it was all a huge mistake: for history has shown that imperial hubris and the degradation of the fighting force only ends one way.

Amid the possibility of a ground force intervention in Libya in early 2011 and continued troop increases in Afghanistan, a split emerged between the Obama administration and the Pentagon over how large the US army should be and what it should be capable of in the future. In a debate which mirrored closely what happened in the build up to the war in Iraq, Secretary of Defense Robert Gates publicly said that "any future defense secretary who advises the president to again send a big American land army into Asia or into the Middle East or Africa should have his head examined."[42] He added that large-scale conflicts with other big countries will likely be fought mainly with air and naval forces. But as he made those comments during a lecture to future army officers at West Point, the soon-to-depart army chief of staff, General George Casey, pointedly cautioned against the "hollowing out" of the armed forces after deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan come to an end.[43] Whichever school of thought wins out will define American expansionism over the next century. In January 2012, Obama seemed to side with Gates. Recognizing the dreadful toll the Irregular Army had taken on the US, in terms of both its soldiers and its ability to project power, Obama outlined a historic change in direction for the military, specifically moving towards a "leaner" military force and away from the troop-heavy ground warfare which defined the War on Terror. He said he wanted "smaller conventional ground forces," which reflected his abandoning what he called "outdated cold war-era systems." "Yes our military will be leaner," he added, "but the world must know the United States is going to maintain our military superiority with armed forces that are agile, flexible, and ready for the full range of contingencies and threats."[44] It sounded exactly like Donald Rumsfeld in 2001.

The US is now profoundly aware of its waning power and how this could impact its future. "Owing to the relative decline of its economic and, to a lesser extent, military power, the US will no longer have the same flexibility in choosing among as many policy options," concluded the National Intelligence Council (which gathers information from all US intelligence agencies) in early 2009.[45] And this weakness will be exploited. Sun Tzu wrote: "When the weapons are dulled, your ardour damped, your strength exhausted and your treasure spent, other chieftains will spring up to take advantage of your extremity. Then no man, however wise, will be able to avert the consequences that must ensue."[46] There's a healthy dose of irony in the fact that Tzu was himself Chinese, the country which is slowly challenging America's role as the world's sole superpower. "When the army is restless and distrustful, trouble is sure to come from other feudal princes," he continues. "This is simply bringing anarchy into the army, and flinging victory away."[47] An anarchist's distrust of bureaucracy and state power is an apt description of Rumsfeld's attitude towards the military.

The decline of the ability of the military to handle combat or even recruit enough troops has seriously compromised the ability of the US to project its power and secure victories. Memories of the returning soldiers' treatment will be hard to shake, and this will likely lead to a version of Vietnam Syndrome, in which many Americans will spurn the military. Even the war-booty expected from the occupations has largely evaded the American imperialist class this time around. Analysis of the two rounds of oil and gas contracts in Iraq shows that US companies won only two of the eighteen contracts, both in joint ventures with other companies. The original plan by the Bush administration was for the Iraqi government to pass a new oil law which would have indirectly privatized Iraq's hydrocarbons through an unconventional type of contracting called "production sharing agreements," which would have given foreign oil companies shares of production and exclusive control over Iraq's oil fields for up to thirty-two years. But the Iraqi constitution requires the parliament to ratify laws, and because of the internal dynamics in the country at the time the parliament ended up being controlled by nationalist parties with anti-occupation politics. Despite the fact that the ruling parties in the Iraqi executive branch were very happy with the Bush oil law, the other parties controlling the legislative branch were opposed to it and ended up blocking it. The Iraqi government then had to revert to an older law that only allows for "technical service agreements," which kept the oil under Iraqi ownership while giving foreign oil companies a flat rate in exchange for services.

As I write this, the US and the world are still in the grips of the crisis that has rocked the global economy since the collapse of Lehman Brothers in September 2008. Unemployment in the US has stayed stubbornly high, which, according to some, has put the issues raised in this book on a temporary back burner as people who can no longer find work turn to the military for salvation. But it would be a mistake to assume this will solve the deep problems in the military. What the War on Terror has shown is that the Pentagon is prepared to dispense with both its regulations and its moral compass when faced with the need to stock any future wars with soldiers. Whatever regulations have been brought back as the wars have wound down —not many, in truth—are therefore still at threat of being ignored again should the situation demand. And this war isn't near to being at its close, either. The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have radicalized thousands of Muslims to take up the fight against the West, it has emboldened Iran through the deposition of the Sunni minority in Iraq, and it has been prosecuted so badly that the invincibility of American power is no longer an illusion that pervades the world. Unfortunately, however, a wounded tiger is much more dangerous than a healthy one.

The US needs to re-evaluate its role in the world and move away from the use of military force which has, in recent history, become self-perpetuating thanks to its competitive advantage. In his autobiography, the former Secretary of State Colin Powell notes how Clinton's Secretary of State Madeleine Albright asked him, "What's the point of having this superb military you're always talking about if we can't use it?"[48] With China rapidly closing in on the US economically, this massive military machine will prove even more dangerous: if you have the means of violence in place, there's a very strong temptation to use it. This is new. America has fought dozens of wars since 1945, but during the Cold War nearly all were fought through "proxy forces," meaning that the US government provided financial and military support to an element in a foreign country that was fighting the "Red Menace." The tactic was used by both the US and the Soviet Union essentially because they both wanted to avoid direct military conflict, and this was met with moderate success.

But at the end of the Cold War, with the Soviet deterrent gone, US planners failed to realize that the military was not designed for the direct interventions and occupations of foreign countries that would now be much easier to execute. Their theory went that with the threat of the Soviet Union gone, the US would be able to use its "full-spectrum military dominance" to entrench its "economic rights." Since the economic supremacy of the US was being challenged, planners were intent on fighting back by exploiting their biggest advantage: the military. In many ways the US turned to attacking Iraq because it could no longer control the global economy and was seeking to regain ground by military means, trying to stem a decades-long structural decline by sending its guns around the world. This was the express philosophy of the lobby group called Project for the New American Century, many members of which became part of the George W. Bush administration. The most informative document produced by this think tank, Rebuilding America's Defenses: Strategies, Forces and Resources for a New Century, noted: "The United States has for decades sought to play a more permanent role in Gulf regional security" and "the unresolved conflict with Iraq provides the immediate justification . . . for a substantial American force presence in the Gulf."[49] But it wasn't what America was good at. "The US in terms of its offensive fire power and global deployment remains absolutely unrivalled, but its weakness is that its forces are not well suited for policing activities," historian Michael Mann tells me. In other words, it has the ability to defeat foreign armies and conquer their cities, but it doesn't have the ability to bring them under control afterwards.

There are a number of reasons for this: first, the US military has no policing record—unlike, for example, the British army in Northern Ireland—while pacification is mostly a political not a military problem. Throughout the Cold War, the US only intervened in foreign countries where there were local allies who with American help could run their countries for them—"even in Vietnam it wasn't implausible that the South Vietnamese government, which had an army of over 200,000 men, could be propped up and successfully pacify the country," adds Mann. The Muslim world is different: the US never had such allies in Iraq or Afghanistan, but launched pre-emptive strikes anyway. But there is another profound problem that renders old-style imperial American power anachronistic: the country has a domestic culture which is not conducive to long-drawn out wars of aggression, as demonstrated by the turmoil during the Vietnam War in the 1960s and 1970s. “American kids are not brought up to be as racist, as stoic in combat, as self-denying in crisis, or as obedient to authority as British kids once were,” writes Mann.[50] That lack of an imperial American culture is a proud tradition: its citizens don’t want to be part of the Empire however much they are pressured to take up arms for it. I want to give the final word to them.

Never Did, Never Will

One afternoon while I was living in Harlem, New York City, I decided to visit Brownsville, one of the poorest neighborhoods in the city, to talk to local people and find out how the War on Terror had affected them. I walked down Pitkin Avenue, which divides the neighborhood into two neat but equally deprived enclaves, an experience miles away from postcard New York with its narrative of gentrification and urban renewal. Homeless addicts pleaded for some change, children pushed each other off rusty bikes, an old woman pulled her luggage behind her, trying to dodge splinters of urban decay. Brownsville was the silent New York City. “We never get journalists here, apart from shootings,” the old woman told me. Overwhelmingly populated by people of Afro-Caribbean lineage (78.2 percent), with one of the worst crime rates in the United States, one of the highest infant mortality indicators, and stellar points in every department of deprivation, it was a military recruiter’s dream.

In the national conversation on Iraq that has cluttered newspapers and magazines to the point of saturation over the past decade, the academics and journalists conducting it have been men and women mostly from a similar class and with narrow ideological differences, used to getting finicky over minor points of disagreement. Most of them didn’t have children in Iraq and haven’t served in the armed forces themselves. Most of them don’t use the public welfare systems and none of them, we can be sure, live in places where the child mortality rate is 11.8 percent. In short, for them, the war and its consequences remains an abstract idea. In Brownsville, New York City, this abstract idea condenses into something very real. People talk effortlessly about how the war has impacted their lives in a tangible and often tragic way. Decquan Copeland, seventeen, is a student on the Acorn program for social justice. He grew up in Brownsville and lives in one of the housing projects off East New York Avenue. “The war has been a disaster for this country and it is still causing so many problems,” he told me. He is a devout Christian and practices at the Mount Sinai Cathedral, the main place of worship in the area. “I know about fifteen people at the Cathedral who have lost uncles, fathers and cousins in the war. And what for?” He pauses and clears his throat. “We often pray for them at Mount Sinai, but it just gets me so angry, that these people have died for nothing.”

Copeland is the prime age for recruitment to the army, and mentions that he has been approached by recruiters on numerous occasions with all of the usual incentives on offer. Brownsville Recruitment Center is located on Pitkin Avenue, an oasis of calm among the chicken shops and street-sellers. In the window are pictures of hardened men and women in combat regalia, affecting faces taut with strength. “There’s strong,” goes the strap, “Then there’s army strong.” US Army Recruiter Sergeant Christopher M. Penrod is reluctant to talk and clams up when I mention I’m a journalist. Before speaking to the press, recruiting officers have to receive approval from higher authorities, which is not forthcoming. Inside, the offices are decrepit and decorated with more yellowing pictures of combat action shots. “I am a Warrior,” reads another poster.

“I can’t deal with death, that’s why I’d never join the army,” says Copeland. What about his friends? “They have all seen what has happened and I think they are probably scared and angry; the thing is, the recruiters are everywhere around here, in our schools, in our streets, in our stores. They tell us we can get some money, make something of ourselves. All that. Some kids fall for it.” In a community district with 50.9 percent of the population on some form of income support, the military is still an appealing career path. Saskia Wilson, sixteen, is a student at Flushing High School. I find her watching television in a laundromat on Legion Street. She wants to go into the military when she finishes school. “It doesn’t scare me; you know, my uncle was in the military, I remember he used to talk about it all the time and I remember getting excited about it. I’ve always been interested in the military—I watch movies and all that shit. When 9/11 happened I thought they were gonna come here, to Brownsville. So you got to defend your country, they came and bombed us so we bomb them back.” Was she talking about Iraq? “Oh sure, it was Iraq that bombed us, so I want to protect my country.” I wondered if her uncle was in Iraq now. “Oh no, my uncle died, he died in the military.” And that doesn’t scare her? “I’m not gonna feel safe, but everybody gotta die someday, it's not like it's heaven here in Brownsville." Her mother is a post office worker, and her father does "nothing," according to Saskia. Her other uncle is in the military in South Carolina. "I used to want to be a teacher," she says. "But that was when I was very young, ever since I was twelve, I've wanted to be in the military, they take care of you."

I find Stevery Carrington, forty-seven, outside Microhousing off Rockaway Avenue. He has been a heroin addict for thirteen years and is living in sheltered accommodation. His eyes burn with real intensity when the subject of Iraq is brought up. "I don't know if I should care," he says. I wondered if the war had affected him personally. "Well, hell yeah, look at all the homelessness around, look at this program," he says, and points to the shelter behind him. "There's subsidized programs, day programs, all these things helping people get their life back on track and they wasting all this money on the war—they could be putting it in here. I've relapsed four times for drug abuse, I need the help, I can tell you." I suggest that the people of Brownsville seem like they have strong feelings about the conflict. "They don't care!" he shouts back. "You live here, you shit here, you fuck here, if anybody know anything they don't say shit, nobody gives a fuck, but the war comes to them through deaths of people they know. That's my relationship with the war—seeing my brothers come back in coffins."

Brownsville has a large Muslim community, mainly African American converts, but there are a sizeable number of believers and an active mosque. I spoke to Abdullah Aziz, fifty-two, who was sitting on Pitkin Avenue outside his friend's shop. He had converted to Islam thirty years ago and worked as a plumber and drug counselor. "I have a son in Iraq," he begins. "He just went, he's in Kuwait until weather conditions allow him to go into Iraq for a year. I think the invasion was politically incorrect, it was unjust, it was for oil, but it's the power that be, and that's it, it is, it be's, so we can't do nothing about it. They talk about due processes, but they are the process!" It was strange that a devout Muslim, against the war morally, would allow his son, twenty years old, to go to the Middle East to fight for the US. "He wanted a career, there's not much else he could do," he says. "The decision was his—he understands he's Muslim and the Koran says Muslims shouldn't kill other Muslims, but then look at Iraq that's what's happening. It's a job to him, they get you young and dumb, but he's also a grown man so we're supporting him. Of course, every parent is worried about it, but you can't do anything, he's got to find his own way, a lot of kids round here do the same shit."

Many people in Brownsville are employed off the record, using anything they have or can get hold of to make money. Melvin Ford, twenty-six, is selling grubby second-hand teddy bears on the main thoroughfare, along with coverless Sudoku and coloring books. He has some strong opinions on the war and gives a historical context on the whole operation: "Well, Bush senior did some stupid shit," he says. "He let Saddam make all that money and get away with it. People forget," he adds, "that's not our oil . . . They should leave Iraq alone," he expands, "bring the troops home and let the Iraqi President deal with it." It transpires that Ford has two cousins who have been in Iraq. One, Lans Franklin, was sent home for going AWOL while the other, Richard Franklin, remains there. "Richard don't know anything," says Ford. "He's been there since 2004, or whenever it started and now I think he's switched to Kuwait or something. He sends letters, tells us he's doing good, how wonderful it all is. But it's the school he went to: they trained him for guns and war, told him how good all that shit is." Richard Franklin has five children, three boys and two girls. They haven't seen him for four years. His brother, Lans, went AWOL and was discharged by the military after going out to Iraq. "He fucked up and it turned him a little crazy, and they said, 'You are gonna drop a fucking bomb on us one day so we're sending you home, we don't need you.'" Lans, from the Bronx originally, had been back for about six months; he has problems hearing, after a bomb went off nearby when he was asleep. "I don't know if he's changed at all," says Ford, getting agitated. "He was definitely drinking more than usual when I last saw him: 'Let's get a six-pack, blah blah,' that kind of shit. He was drinking two six-packs and liquor every day when I saw him last. He's kind of crazy now, but the military don't help him." He pauses and looks down. "Never did, never will."

Notes

INTRODUCTION

1 Christopher Griffin, "The War at Home," Armed Forces Journal, March 2006.

2 http://www.defense.gov/speeches/speech.aspx?speechid=430.

3 Pierre Tristam, "Private Contractors in Iraq Still Double Overall Troop Presence," About.com, August 29, 2010; http://middleeast.about.com.

4 See Jeremy Scahill, Blackwater (Nation Books, 2007) and Naomi Klein, The Shock Doctrine (Picador, 2008).

5 Michael O'Hanlon, "Come Partly Home, America: How to Downsize U.S. Deployments Abroad," Foreign Affairs, March/April 2001.

6 President Bush Speaks at Naval Academy Commencement, May 25, 2001; http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/onpolitics/transcripts/bushtext052501.htm.

7 Press Release, "One In Five Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans Suffer from PTSD or Major Depression," Rand Corp., April 17, 2008.

8 "TOP SECRET POLO STEP," The National Security Archive; http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB214/index.htm.

9 "The Invasion and Occupation of Iraq: Conversation with Harry Kreisler"; http://globetrotter.berkeley.edu/people6/Gordon/gordon-con3.html.

10 "Army Chief says 200,000 Troops Needed to Keep the Peace," Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2003.

11 "TOP SECRET POLO STEP," The National Security Archive.

12 Ibid.

13 Ann Scott Tyson, "Two Years Later, Iraq War Drains Military," Washington Post, March 19, 2005.

14 Andrew F. Krepinevich, "The Thin Green Line," Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, August 14, 2004, p. 1; http://www.observulsion.com/docs/B.20040812.GrnLne.pdf.

15 Ibid., p. 7.

16 Ibid.

17 Ibid., p. 15.

18 Ibid., p. 18.

19 Bryan Bender, "Military Considers Recruiting Foreigners," Boston Globe, December 26, 2006.

20 "Stray Voltage," Armed Forces Journal, June 1, 2005.

21 Press Release from Rangel Office, "Rangel Reintroduces Draft Bill," February 14, 2006; http://www.house.gov/list/press/ny15_rangel/CBRStatementonDraft02142006.html.

22 "Statement on House of Representatives Action on Legislation To Reinstate the Draft," Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, October 11, 2004; http://connection.ebscohost.com/c/articles/14975065/statement-house-representatives-action-legislation-reinstate-draft.

23 "Americans Reject Reinstating the Military Draft," March 18, 2006; http://www.angus-reid.com/polls/11567/americans_reject_reinstating_the_military_draft/.

24 Christian G. Appy, Working Class War (University of North Carolina, 1993), p. 6.

25 Ibid., p. 15.

26 Ibid., p. 32.

27 Ibid., p. 15.

28 "More Troops to be Deployed to Iraq: About 37,000 Will Come From Guard, Reserve Units," Associated Press, May 4, 2004.

29 http://www.unitedforpeace.org/article.php?id=2887.

30 http://www.randproject.org/news/press/2010/06/14.html.

31 "Need Help With a Down Payment? Ask the Army," Associated Press, August 9, 2007.

32 Jamie Wilson, "US Lowers Standards in Army Numbers Crisis," Guardian, June 4, 2005.

33 "Rep. Susan A. Davis Holds a Hearing on Army Recruiting and Retention—Committee Hearing," CQ Transcriptions, August 1, 2007.

34 "Army, Marines Allow More Convicts to Enlist," Reuters, April 21, 2008.

35 "Rep. Susan A. Davis Holds a Hearing on Army Recruiting and Retention—Committee Hearing," CQ Transcriptions, August 1, 2007.

36 All unattributed quotations in the book are drawn from interviews conducted by the author.

CHAPTER 1: THE OTHER "DON'T ASK, DON'T TELL"

1 "Screening for Potential Terrorists in the Enlisted Military Accessions Process," Defense Personnel Security Research Center, April 2005, p. 12; http://www.fas.org/irp/eprint/screening.pdf.

2 Andrew Macdonald (pseudonym), The Turner Diaries: A Novel (Barricade Books, 1996).

3 "Guidelines for Handling Dissident and Protest Activities Among Members of the Armed Forces," DOD Directive 1325.6, 1969; http://www.dtic.mil/whs/directives/corres/pdf/132506p.pdf.

4 (SPLC President) Richard Cohen, "Letter to Secretary Gates: Extremists Continue to Infiltrate Military," November 26, 2008; http://www.splcenter.org/get-informed/news/letter-to-secretary-gates-extremists-continue-to-infiltrate-military.

5 "Extremist Activities," Department of the Army Pamphlet 600–15, June 1, 2000; http://www.apd.army.mil/pdffiles/p600_15.pdf.

6 "Screening for Potential Terrorists in the Enlisted Military Accessions Process," Defense Personnel Security Research Center, April 2005, p. xiv.

7 The phone calls were made in March 2008, from New York City.

8 Dan Ephron, "The Guard Who Found Islam," Newsweek, March 21, 2009.

9 "Army Command Policy," Army Regulation 600-20, 18 March 18, 2008; http://www.apd.army.mil/jw2/xmldemo/r600_20/main.asp.

10 "Colonel is Top-ranking Officer Killed in Iraq," CNN, October 31, 2005.

11 Curtis Krueger, "Policing the Peace is Just Part of War," St. Petersburg Times, April 12, 2003.

12 "The Hammerskin Nation," Extremism in America, Anti-Defamation League; http://www.adl.org/learn/ext_us/Hammerskin.asp?LEARN_Cat=Extremism&LEARN_SubCat=Extremism_in_America&xpicked=3&item=hn.

13 David Holthouse, "A Few Bad Men: Racist Extremists Infiltrating US Military," SPLC's Intelligence Report, Issue 122, Summer 2006.

14 J.D. Leipold, "Army Changes Tattoo Policy," Army News Service, March 18, 2006.

15 Jon Ronson, "Conspirators," Guardian, May 5, 2001.

16 Stephen Lemons, "AZ Neo-Nazi Icon Elton Hall Hit by Vehicle While Protesting Salvador Reza's Day-labor Center," Phoenix New Times, February 10, 2008.

17 Mark Potok, "Rage on the Right: The Year in Hate and Extremism," SPLC Intelligence Report, Issue 137, Spring 2010.

18 www.newsaxon.org.

19 www.bloodandhonour.com.

20 Sonia Scherr, "Leaked Neo-Nazi E-mails Show Contacts With Military Personnel," SPLC blog, September 3, 2009.

21 Wikileaks release: NSM private emails; http://file.wikileaks.info/leak/nsmfargo-hotmail-emails-2009/msg00273.html.

22 http://www.npr.org/news/images/2008/feb/08/eastpage1.html.

23 "US Soldier Says he Randomly Shot at Iraqis," Associated Press, January 9, 2008.

24 Dan Edge, "Fort Carson Soldiers' Killing Spree After Iraq Combat," BBC News, August 25, 2010.

25 Matt Kennard, "Neo-Nazis are in the Army Now," Salon, June 2009.

26 "US Marine Sniper Unit Photographed With 'Nazi SS' Flag," BBC News, February 10, 2012.

27 "Rightwing Extremism: Current Economic and Political Climate Fueling Resurgence in Radicalization and Recruitment," Department of Homeland Security, April 7, 2009; http://www.fas.org/irp/eprint/rightwing.pdf.

28 "White Supremacist Recruitment of Military Personnel Since 9/11," FBI report; http://cryptome.org/spy-whites.pdf.

29 "Gang-Related Activity in the US Armed Forces Increasing," National Gang Intelligence Center, January 12, 2007; http://militarytimes.com/static/projects/pages/ngic_gangs.pdf.

30 Holthouse, "A Few Bad Men," SPLC, Summer 2006.

31 (SPLC President) Richard Cohen, Letter, June 7, 2011; http://beforeitsnews.com/story/696/459/SPLC_Exclusive:_DHS_Has_Stopped_Investigating_Right-wing_Extremists.html.

32 Michael Miller, "Armed Neo-Nazis Now Patrolling Sanford, Say They Are 'Prepared' For Post-Trayvon Martin Violence," Miami New Times Blog, April 6, 2012.

33 Holthouse, "A Few Bad Men," SPLC, Summer 2006.

34 http://www.splcenter.org/get-informed/intelligence-report/browse-all-issues/2006/summer/a-few-bad-men/pentagon-in-denial.

35 Holthouse, "A Few Bad Men," SPLC, Summer 2006.

36 Figures obtained by the author from the DOD in 2008 through the Freedom of Information Act.

37 Summary of Investigative Activity: Reports obtained by the author from CID through the Freedom of Information Act in 2008 (from which the following quotations are taken).

38 Ibid.

39 "Screening for Potential Terrorists in the Enlisted Military Accessions Process," Defense Personnel Security Research Center, April 2005.

40 Thelma Gutierez, "Gangs in the Military—Part 1," CNN, May 9, 2007; http://transcripts.cnn.com/TRANSCRIPTS/0705/09/pzn.01.html.

41 "Former Airman Charged in Soldier's Death," Associated Press, February 11, 2009.

42 Steve Mraz, "Slain Soldier's Family Still Waiting for Justice," Stars and Stripes, May 30, 2006.

43 Tech. Sgt. Kati Garcia, "Little Rock Airman Convicted, Sentenced in Court-martial," Air Force website, January 27, 2009; http://www.af.mil/news/story.asp?id=123132916.

44 "Armed Services Defendant Arrested and Charged With Second Degree Murder of Army Sergeant Juwan Johnson in Hohenecken, Germany," Department of Justice, February 6, 2009; http://www.justice.gov/usao/dc/Press_Releases/2009%20Archives/February/09-034.html.

45 "Former U.S. Air Force Airman Convicted of Second Degree Murder of Army Sergeant in Germany," US Fed News, November 16, 2010.

46 "Soldier Convicted in Gang Beating Death of Sgt.," Associated Press, February 26, 2009.

47 "Verdict in Gang-initiation Death Trial Angers Victim's Mother," Stars and Stripes, February 27, 2009.

48 Garcia, "Little Rock Airman Convicted, Sentenced in Court-martial," Air Force website, January 27, 2009.

49 Steve Mraz, "Soldier Says Life Threatened for Speaking Up," Stars and Stripes, February 10, 2007 (from which the following quotations are taken).

50 "Gang-Related Activity in the US Armed Forces Increasing," National Gang Intelligence Center, January 12, 2007 (from which the following quotations are taken).

51 Rod Powers, "Army Criminal History Waivers," About.com; http://usmilitary.about.com/od/armyjoin/a/criminal.-u59.htm.

52 "Gang-Related Activity in the US Armed Forces Increasing," National Gang Intelligence Center, January 12, 2007.

53 Gustav Eyler, "Gangs in the Military," The Yale Law Journal, Vol. 118, 2009.

54 Seth Robson, "FBI Says U.S. Criminal Gangs are Using Military to Spread Their Reach," Stars and Stripes, December 7, 2006.

55 Eyler, "Gangs in the Military" (from which the following quotations are taken).

56 "Gang-Related Activity in the US Armed Forces Increasing," National Gang Intelligence Center, January 12, 2007.

57 Ibid.

58 "Exclusive: Gangs Spreading in the Military," CBS News, July 28, 2007.

59 Robson, "FBI Says U.S. Criminal Gangs are Using Military to Spread Their Reach."

60 "Local Police Say Fort Sill Has a Gang Problem," Associated Press, November 10, 2008.

61 Ron Jackson, "Fort Sill Gang Dispute Intensifies," Newsok.com, November 11, 2008; http://newsok.com/fort-sill-gang-dispute-intensifies/article/3320983.

62 Josh Gerstein, "Army Transfers Could Trigger A Gang War," New York Sun, March 16, 2006 (from which the following quotations are taken).

63 H.R. 4986: National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2008; http://www.govtrack.us/congress/bill.xpd?tab=summary&bill=h110-4986.

64 Leo Shane III, "Bill Would Ban Gang Membership in Ranks," Stars and Stripes, December 15, 2007.

65 Ibid.

66 Eyler, "Gangs in the Military."

67 "National Gang Threat Assessment 2009," National Gang Intelligence Center, January 2009.

68 Ibid.

69 Ibid.

70 James M. Klatell, "Are Gang Members Using Military Training?," CBS News, July 28, 2007.

71 "Inside the FBI," podcast, February 6, 2009; http://www.fbi.gov/news/podcasts/inside/gangs/view.

72 "Gang Activity in the Military," KFOX TV, March 13, 2006; http://www.kfoxtv.com/news/7978035/detail.html

73 "Gang Members in the Army, Part I," California Department of Justice, November, 2005; http://img2.tapuz.co.il/forums/1_90024783.pdf.

74 Garth Stapley, "Family of Slain Ceres Officer Speaks to Help Others Weather Own Tragedies," The Modesto Bee, January 11, 2010.

75 “Gang Members in the Army, Part I,” California Department of Justice, November, 2005.

76 http://icasualties.org.

77 “National Gang Threat Assessment 2009,” National Gang Intelligence Center, January, 2009.

78 Ben Conery, “U.S., Mexican Drug Gangs Form Alliances,” Washington Times, March 26, 2010.

79 “Clinton Pledges Broader US Effort on Mexico Drugs Gangs,” BBC News, March 24, 2010; http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/8582497.stm.

80 “3 Teens Charged in Cartel Slaying,” Associated Press, August 13, 2009.

81 http://articles.latimes.com/2009/aug/13/nation/na-drug-killing13.

82 “US Army Soldier Michael Jackson Apodaca Arrested for Contract Kill in Mexican Drug Cartel Murder,” New York Daily News, August 11, 2009.

83 Geoffrey Ramsey, “Arrest of Would-Be ‘Zetas’ Shows Risk of US Military Infiltration,” InSight Crime, March 29, 2012; http://insightcrime.org/insight-latest-news/item/2415-arrest-of-would-be-zetas-shows-risk-of-us-military-infiltration.

84 “Gang-Related Activity in the US Armed Forces Increasing,” National Gang Intelligence Center, January 12, 2007.

85 “Soldier Accused in Gang Shootings,” Baltimore Sun, October 17, 2007.

86 “Soldier Held in City Shooting Could be Freed,” Baltimore Sun, October 18, 2007.

87 “Gang-Related Activity in the US Armed Forces Increasing,” National Gang Intelligence Center, January 12, 2007.

88 “Gang Members in the Army, Part I,” California Department of Justice, November 2005.

89 “Ex-Guard Soldier Faces Gun Smuggling Charges,” Associated Press, September 22, 2006.

90 Linda Rosencrance, “GAO: Stolen U.S. Military Gear Sold on eBay, Craigslist,” Computerworld, April 14, 2008.

91 Timothy Roberts, “City to Vote on Assault Rifle Buy, Cops Want an M-4 in Every Patrol Car,” El Paso Times, January 12, 2010.

92 Eric M. Weiss, “Probe: Robbers Used Weapons Smuggled From Iraq by Soldier,” Washington Post, July 16, 2006 (from which the following quotations are taken).

93 “Tancredo Concerned Military Officials Unaware of Gang Infiltration in U.S. Army,” Rep. Tancredo’s Congressional Website, April 9, 2008; http://tancredo.house.gov.

94 Art Winslow, “Review: Black Hearts: One Platoon’s Descent into Madness in Iraq’s Triangle of Death, by Jim Frederick,” Chicago Tribune; http://www.chicagotribune.com/entertainment/books/chi-books-reviews-black-hearts-frederick,0,5714703.story.

95 Jim Frederick, “The Blackest Hearts: War Crimes in Iraq,” Guardian, July 24, 2010.

96 Wikileaks Iraq War Logs; www.wikileaks.ch.

97 “Disabilities of Convicted Felons: A State-by-State Survey, 1996,” US Department of Justice; https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/pr/195110.pdf.

98 Michael Boucai, "Balancing Your Strengths Against Your Felonies: Considerations for Military Recruitment of Ex-Offenders," Palm Center, September 2007.

99 "Military Grants More Waivers to Recruits," Associated Press, February 14, 2007.

100 "Military Enlistment of Felons Has Doubled," Palm Center Report, February 13, 2007.

101 Ibid.

102 Al Baker, "Soldier Says Pardon Buoys His Hopes for Police Career," New York Times, January 2, 2010.

103 "A Well-earned Second Chance," New York Daily News, January 2, 2010.

104 Sig Christenson, "When Inmates Become US Army Soldiers," San Antonio Express-News, March 22, 2010.

105 Ibid.

106 Ann Scott Tyson, "Military Waivers for Ex-Convicts Increase," Washington Post, April 22, 2008.

107 Ibid.

108 "Military Recruiting: New Initiatives Could Improve Criminal History Screening," GAO Report, February 23, 1999; http://www.gao.gov/archive/1999/ns99053.pdf.

109 Boucai, "Balancing Your Strengths Against Your Felonies."

110 Lizette Alvarez, "Army Giving More Waivers in Recruiting," New York Times, February 14, 2007.

111 Lizette Alvarez, "Army And Marine Corps Grant More Felony Waivers," New York Times, April 22, 2008.

112 "Marine Who Killed Iraqi Set Free," Associated Press, December 15, 2007.

113 Russell Carollo, "Troops Linked to Crimes in Iraq War were Recruited Despite Troubled Pasts," Macon Telegraph, July 20, 2008 (from which the following quotations are taken).

114 Perry Jefferies, Letters, New York Times, February 25, 2007.

115 Alvarez, "Army And Marine Corps Grant More Felony Waivers."

116 "Waxman Requests Pentagon Docs on Recruitment," Politico.com, April 21, 2008; http://www.politico.com/blogs/thecrypt/0408/Waxman_requests_Pentagon_docs_on_recruitment.html.

117 "More Convicted Felons Allowed to Enlist in Army, Marines," Associated Press, April 21, 2008.

118 "Military Takes More Recruits with Criminal Pasts," Associated Press, October 10, 2007.

119 "House Panel Probes Army's Waivers for Recruits With Criminal Histories," CQ Today, April 21, 2008.

120 Scott Tyson, "Military Waivers for Ex-Convicts Increase."

121 Adam Liptak, "1 in 100 U.S. Adults Behind Bars, New Study Says," New York Times, February 28, 2008.

122 "Military Enlistment of Felons has Doubled," Palm Center Report, February 13, 2007.

123 "Jailhouse Recruiting," Local CBS News Channel; http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=WvXkQHuuZN0.

124 "Rep. Susan A. Davis Holds a Hearing on Army Recruiting and Retention—Committee Hearing," CQ Transcriptions, 1 August 2007.

125 Mark Benjamin, "Out of Jail, Into the Army," Salon, February 2, 2006.

126 Sig Christenson, "From Prison Stripes to Sergeant's Stripes," San Antonio Express-News, March 21, 2010.

127 Ann Scott Tyson, "Army More Selective as Economy Lags," Washington Post, April 17, 2009.

128 Ned Parker, "Sniper Unit Chief Tells of Ordering Slaying," Los Angeles Times, February 9, 2008.

129 Ibid.

130 Carollo, "Troops Linked to Crimes in Iraq War Were Recruited Despite Troubled Pasts."

131 Ibid.

132 "Complaint," United District Court in the Eastern District of Virginia, February 15, 2011.

133 Matt Kennard, "Pentagon Harassment Suit May Spark Further Action," Financial Times, April 15, 2011.

134 Elisabeth Bumiller, "Sex Assault Reports Rise in Military," New York Times, March 16, 2010.

135 Kennard, "Pentagon Harassment Suit May Spark Further Action."

136 "Sexual Assault in Military 'Jaw-dropping,' Lawmaker Says," CNN, July 31, 2008.

CHAPTER 2: SICK, ADDICTED, AND FORSAKEN

1 Lizette Alvarez, "After the Battle, Fighting the Bottle at Home," New York Times, July 8, 2008.

2 Greg Miller, "Alcohol Cited as Problem at Prison," Los Angeles Times, July 13, 2004.

3 Ibid.

4 Statistics obtained from the DOD by the author via the Freedom of Information Act.

5 Paul von Zielbauer, "For U.S. Troops at War, Liquor Is Spur to Crime," New York Times, March 13, 2007,

6 Ibid.

7 Gregg Zoroya, "More Soldiers Seek Drug Abuse Help," USA Today, November 21, 2008.

8 Ibid.

9 Alvarez, "After the Battle, Fighting the Bottle at Home."

10 Paul von Zielbauer, "In Iraq, American Military Finds it Has an Alcohol Problem," New York Times, March 12, 2007.

11 Ibid.

12 "Study: Binge Drinking Common in Military," CBS News, February 13, 2009; http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2009/02/13/health/main4800944.shtml.

13 Corey Pein, "US Military's Party Budget Includes Thousands For Alcohol in Afghanistan," War Is Business website, December 31, 2010; http://www.warisbusiness.com/features/ledger/military-alcohol-in-afghanistan/.

14 Charles Laurence, "How the Iraq War is Destroying America's Fighting Men," Daily Mail, March 20, 2007.

15 Ibid.

16 Ibid.

17 "Afghan Alcohol Ban After Nato Staff Were 'Too Hungover' to Give Explanation for Airstrike that Killed 70 Civilians," Daily Mail, September 9, 2009.

18 "Alcohol Banned on Afghanistan Base After Troops Party Too Hard," Daily Telegraph, September 8, 2009.

19 "Alcohol Abuse on Rise Among US Soldiers: Reports," AFP, June 19, 2009.

20 Ewen MacAskill and David Batty, "US Embassy Bans Alcohol at Guards' Quarters After Claims of 'Lewd' Parties," Guardian, September 3, 2009.

21 Ibid.

22 "Report: U.S. Sailor Arrested in Killing in Japan," Associated Press, April 3, 2008.

23 "Drunk American Kills Prized Bengal Tiger," Sky News, September 20, 2003.

24 "Afghan Drug Trafficking Brings US $50 Billion a Year," Russia Today, August 20, 2009.

25 Shaun McCanna, "It's Easy for Soldiers to Score Heroin in Afghanistan," Salon, August 7, 2007.

26 http://www.heroin-detox.org/drug_czar.htm.

27 McCanna, "It's Easy for Soldiers to Score Heroin in Afghanistan."

28 Robert Lewis and Kate McCarthy, "War Vets Fighting Addiction," ABC News, November 26, 2007.

29 Lisa Daniel, "October is Drug Abuse Prevention Month," American Forces Press Service, October 16, 2010.

30 Hugh C. McBride, "Alcohol Abuse on the Rise Among Combat Veterans"; http://www.drug-rehabs.com/addiction_alcohol-abuse-among-combat-vets.htm.

31 Gregg Zoroya, "More Soldiers Seek Drug Abuse Help," USA Today, November 21, 2008.

32 Ibid.

33 Brad Knickerbocker, "Military Looks to Drugs for Battle Readiness," The Christian Science Monitor, August 9, 2002.

34 Elliot Borin, "The U.S. Military Needs Its Speed," Wired, February 10, 2003.

35 Ibid.

36 Melody Petersen, "U.S. Military: Heavily Armed and Medicated," MSNBC, May 19, 2009; http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/30748260/ns/health-health_care/.

37 Ibid.

38 Ibid.

39 "U.S. Soldiers Involved in Drug Smuggling Ring," ABC News, October 26, 2005.

40 Ibid.

41 David Adam, "Ecstasy Trials for Combat Stress," Guardian, February 17, 2005.

42 "PTSD Symptom Reduction by Propranolol Given After Trauma Memory Activation"; http://clinicaltrials.gov/ct2/show/NCT00645450.

43 Ibid.

44 Clayton Dach, "America's Chemically Modified 21st Century Soldiers," Alternet, May 3, 2008.

45 Brandon Keim, "Uncle Sam Wants Your Brain," Wired, August 13, 2008.

46 Brian Ross and Vic Walter, "'Disposable Heroes': Veterans Used To Test Suicide-Linked Drugs," ABC News, June 17, 2008.

47 Jake Tapper and Maddy Sauer, "Obama on Vet Drug Tests: 'Outrageous'; Meanwhile WH Slams ABC News Report," ABC News, June 17, 2008.

48 Tony Newman, "Support the Troops: Especially When They Come Back with Substance Abuse Problems," Commondreams.org, August 2, 2005; http://www.commondreams.org/views05/0802-21.htm.

49 Alvarez, "After the Battle, Fighting the Bottle at Home."

50 Lewis and McCarthy, "War Vets Fighting Addiction."

51 McCanna, "It's Easy for Soldiers to Score Heroin in Afghanistan."

52 Lizette Alvarez, "Concerns Grow About Treatment for Veterans," New York Times, July 9, 2008.

53 Alvarez, "After the Battle, Fighting the Bottle at Home."

54 www.thatguy.com.

55 Penny Coleman, "Pentagon, Big Pharma: Drug Troops to Numb Them to Horrors of War," Alternet, January 10, 2008.

56 Petersen, "U.S. Military: Heavily Armed and Medicated."

57 Paul Harasim, "Grieving Family Hopes Army Finds What Prompted Suicide," Las Vegas Review-Journal, September 11, 2007.

58 David Olinger and Erin Emery, "Waging Internal War," Denver Post, August 27, 2008.

59 Ibid.

60 Ibid.

61 "Rep. Berkley Issues Statement on Truth about Veterans' Suicides," US Fed News, May 6, 2008.

62 Olinger and Emery, "Waging Internal War."

63 Lizzette Alvarez, "Suicides of Soldiers Reach High of Nearly 3 Decades," New York Times, January 29, 2009.

64 Mike Mount, "June Was Worst Month for Army Suicides, Statistics Show," CNN, July 15, 2010; http://www.rawa.org/temp/runews/2010/07/15/june-was-worst-month-for-army-suicides-statistics-show.html#ixzz18Bwhrq67.

65 Aaron Glantz, "After Service, Veteran Deaths Surge," New York Times, October 16, 2010.

66 Michael Riley and Tom Roeder, "Intense Combat Tied to Homicides by Ft. Carson GIs," Denver Post, July 16, 2009.

67 Tom Roeder, "Fort Carson Report: Combat Stress Contributed to Soldiers' Crimes Back Home," The Gazette, July 16, 2009.

68 Ibid.

69 Bill Berkowitz, "The Military's Mounting Mental Health Problems," Alternet, April 30, 2004.

70 Mark Benjamin, "Army Sent Mentally Ill Troops to Iraq," UPI, March 12, 2004; http://www.upi.com/Business_News/Security-Industry/2004/03/12/Army-sent-mentally-ill-troops-to-Iraq/UPI-97331079131967/.

71 "Army Tours in Iraq to be Extended, Gates Says," MSNBC, April 11, 2007; http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/18059112/ns/world_news-mideast_n_africa/t/army-tours-iraq-be-extended-gates-says/#.T3nSBL9rPNo.

72 William Yardley, "Killings Add to Worries at Soldier's Home Base," New York Times, March 11, 2012.

73 "Report: Suicidal Troops Sent into Combat," Associated Press, May 13, 2006.

74 Rick Rogers, "Some Troops Headed Back to Iraq are Mentally Ill," Union-Tribune, March 19, 2006.

75 "Report: Suicidal Troops Sent into Combat," Associated Press, May 13, 2006.

76 Army Maj. Gen. Raymond Palumbo, "Resiliency is the Key to Success," Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson Website, November 10, 2011; http://www.jber.af.mil/news/story.asp?id=123279673.

77 Petersen, "U.S. Military: Heavily Armed and Medicated" (from which the following quotations are taken).

78 "WikiLeaks Accused Bradley Manning 'should never have been sent to Iraq'," Guardian, May 27, 2011.

79 Evan Hansen, "Manning-Lamo Chat Logs Revealed," Wired, July 13, 2011.

80 Elizabeth Curlee, "Mental Illness in the Military on the Rise," CBS News, June 15, 2007.

81 Ibid.

82 "Democrats Slam Budget Cuts for Veterans' Services," CNN, March 19, 2005.

83 Thomas B. Edsall, "Funds for Health Care of Veterans $1 Billion Short," Washington Post, June 24, 2005.

84 "Bush FY 2006 Budget Proposal Might Mean 'Deep Cuts' in Veterans' Health Care," Kaiserhealthnews.org, February 13, 2005; http://www.kaiserhealthnews.org/Daily-Reports/2005/February/11/dr00028116.aspx.

85 Editorial, "Veterans Without Health Care," New York Times, November 9, 2007.

86 Ibid.

87 Ann Scott Tyson, "Pentagon Report Criticizes Troops' Mental-Health Care," Washington Post, June 16, 2007.

88 Bob Egelko, "Veterans Not Entitled to Mental Health Care, U.S. Lawyers Argue," San Francisco Chronicle, February 5, 2008.

89 Linda D. Kozaryn, "President Honors Veterans, Families at USS Intrepid Ceremony," American Forces Press Service, November 11, 2008.

90 Matt Kennard, "Obama Under Pressure Over Veterans Benefits," Financial Times, March 3, 2011.

91 Matthew Kauffman and Lisa Chedekel, "Slipping Through the System Special Report: Mentally Unfit, Forced to Fight," The Hartford Courant, May 15, 2006 (from which the following quotations are taken).

92 Michael de Yoanna and Mark Benjamin, "I am Under a Lot of Pressure to Not Diagnose PTSD," Salon, April 8, 2009.

93 Roeder, "Fort Carson Report: Combat Stress Contributed to Soldiers' Crimes Back Home."

94 "Study Finds Toops Shy Away From Mental Health Care," CNN, April 30, 2008.

95 Sgt. Joshua Risner, "Tour Raises Awareness of Mental Illness," Army News Service, September 9, 2009.

96 "One in Five Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans Suffer from PTSD or Major Depression," Rand Corp., April 17, 2008.

97 Ann Zieger, "U.S. Mental Health Spending Rising Rapidly," Health News, August 6, 2009.

98 Wendell Marsh, "Jobless Rate Among Veterans Highest in Five Years," Reuters, February 5, 2011.

99 Kennard, "Obama Under Pressure over Veteran Benefits" (from which the following quotations are taken).

100 Robert Longley, "VA-HUD Issue First-Ever Homeless Veterans Report," About.com, February 14, 2011; http://usgovinfo.about.com/od/resourcesforveterans/a/Homeless-Veterans-Report.htm.

101 "Boxer Joins Colleagues, Veterans Advocates to Oppose Extreme GOP Proposal to Deny Housing to 10,000 Homeless Veterans," Press Release of U.S. Senator Barbara Boxer, March 10, 2011.

102 Craig Roberts, "HUD-VASH Vouchers Survive Budget Cut," The American Legion, April 13, 2011.

103 Rick Maze, "18 Veterans Commit Suicide Each Day," Army Times, April 22, 2010.

104 Matt Kennard, "US Companies in Iraq: Touting for Business," Financial Times' Beyond Brics blog, August 30, 2011.

CHAPTER 3: PLUMP, YOUNG, DUMB—AND READY TO SERVE

1 "Too Fat to Fight? Obesity Becomes National Security Issue, Weight Would Disqualify Many Potential Military Recruits," University of Buffalo News Release, November 27, 2002; http://www.buffalo.edu/news/fast-execute.cgi/article-page.html?article=59700009.

2 "An Overweight Army," The Douglass Report, September 26, 2005; http://douglassreport.com/2005/09/26/an-overweight-army/.

3 "Too Fat to Fight? . . .," University at Buffalo News Release, November 27, 2002.

4 Medical Surveillance Monthly Report, Volume 16, Number 01, Armed Forces Health Surveillance Center, January 2009.

5 "Top Army Recruiter Weighs Fat Camp for Recruits," Associated Press, January 12, 2009.

6 Julia Sommerfeld, "Battling the Bulge," Knight Ridder News Service, May 12, 2003.

7 Ibid.

8 Chris Ayres, "US Troops are Losing Battle of the Bulge," Times, November 18, 2002.

9 Ibid.

10 Alvarez, "Army And Marine Corps Grant More Felony Waivers."

11 Douglas Belkin, "Struggling for Recruits, Army Relaxes its Rules," Boston Globe, February 20, 2006.

12 Matt Kennard, "Army Discharge Stats Suggest that Wartime Breeds a New Attitude Towards Soldiers Who are 'Different,'" Columbia News Service, April 15, 2008.

13 "Top Army Recruiter Weighs Fat Camp for Recruits," Associated Press, 12 January, 2009 (from which the following two quotations are taken).

14 Bo Joyner, "Fit to Fight: Program Pushes Reservists to Pursue Healthier Lifestyle," Citizen Airman, August 2004.

15 Andrew Tilghman, "New Rules Allow More Body Fat With Age," Marine Corps Times, March 31, 2008.

16 "Obesity in the Military on the Rise," RedOrbit.com, February 11, 2009; http://www.redorbit.com/news/health/1637795/obesity_in_the_military_on_the_rise/.

17 Documents obtained by the author from the Pentagon through the Freedom of Information Act.

18 Ibid.

19 Letters, Army Times, January 28, 2010.

20 Sandra Jontz, "More Servicemembers Fighting Battle of Bulge," Stars and Stripes, February 11, 2009.

21 Oliver August, "'Battle of the Bulge' Begins as US Troops Stand Easy," Times, November 13, 2009.

22 Ibid.

23 Mark Townsend, "British Army Changes Rules to Allow Obese Recruits to Enlist," Observer, August 2, 2009.

24 Ibid.

25 Neva Grant, "Helping Dropouts Break the Cycle of Poverty," National Public Radio, March 27, 2006; http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=5300726.

26 First Lt. Kyle Key and Spc. Austin Hurt, "Guard's Patriot Academy Gives Dropouts Second Chance," Army.mil, August 27, 2009; www.army.mil/article/26681/ (from which the following quotations are taken).

27 Sgt. Brad Staggs, Indiana National Guard, "First Student Arrives for First Patriot Academy Class," NationalGuard.mil, June 3, 2009; http://www.nationalguard.mil/news/archives/2009/06/060309-First.aspx.

28 "Readiness Subcommittee Hearing on Budget Request for Army Reserve, Army National Guard and Air National Guard Training and Operations," Gpo.gov, April 27, 2010; http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/CHRG-111hhrg58105/html/CHRG-111hhrg58105.htm.

29 Diana Penner, "Centerpiece; Taking on a Challenge," Indianapolis Star, August 27, 2009.

30 Sgt. Mike R. Smith, "Guard's Education and Youth Programs Take Center Stage in Atlanta," National Guard Bureau, July 28, 2009.

31 Sgt. Robert G. Cooper III, "Patriot Academy Offers Soldiers Second Chance at High School Diploma," Arng.army.mil, August 26, 2009; http://www.arng.army.mil/News/Pages/PatriotAcademy.aspx.

32 Sgt. David Bruce, "Patriot Academy Diversifies Student Body," Army.mil, July 13, 2010; http://www.army.mil/article/42178/.

33 "Ready, Willing, and Unable to Serve," A Report by Mission: Readiness; http://d15h7vkr8e4okv.cloudfront.net/NATEE1109.pdf.

34 Ibid.

35 James J. Heckman and Paul A. LaFontaine, "The Declining American High School Graduation Rate: Evidence, Sources, and Consequences," The National Bureau of Economic Research, February 13, 2008.

36 Neva Grant, "Helping Dropouts Break the Cycle of Poverty," NPR, March 27, 2006; http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=5300726.

37 Mark Thompson, "Army Recruiting More Dropouts," Time, January 23, 2008.

38 Henry Giroux, "Obama's Betrayal of Public Education? Arne Duncan and the Corporate Model of Schooling," Truthout, December 17, 2008; http://www.truth-out.org/121708R.

39 Program's website: http://www.ngycp.org/.

40 Eric Eckholm, "Discipline of Military Redirects Dropouts," New York Times, March 7, 2009.

41 Ibid.

42 "Ready, Willing, and Unable to Serve," A Report by Mission: Readiness.

43 "Army Opens Prep School for Recruited Dropouts," Associated Press, August 27, 2008 (from which the following quotations are taken).

44 http://www.arng.army.mil/News/publications/fs/2008/graphics/afr_fy08_text.doc.

45 Army National Guard Annual Financial Report, FY2009; http://www.arng.army.mil/News/publications/fs/2009/index.htm.

46 Appy, Working Class War, p. 32.

47 Ibid.

48 Thompson, "Army Recruiting More Dropouts."

49 "US Military Heads for Crisis in Recruitment," New York Times News Service, June 12, 2005; http://www.taipeitimes.com/News/world/archives/2005/06/12/2003258996.

50 Mark C. Young and Leonard A. White, "Preliminary Operational Findings From the Army's Tier Two Attrition Screen (TTAS) Measure," U.S. Army Research Institute for the Behavioral and Social Sciences; http://www.dtic.mil/cgi-bin/GetTRDoc?AD=ADA481765.

51 Tom Philpott, "Army Signs More Dropouts," Military.com, November 22, 2006; http://www.military.com/features/0,15240,119382,00.html.

52 Eric Schmitt, "Army Recruiting More High School Dropouts to Meet Goals," New York Times, June 11, 2005.

53 Fred Kaplan, "GI Schmo," Slate, January 9, 2006.

54 Schmitt, "Army Recruiting More High School Dropouts to Meet Goals."

55 Richard Herrnstein and Charles Murray, The Bell Curve: Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life (Free Press, 1994).

56 Thompson, "Army Recruiting More Dropouts."

57 "DOD Instruction," March 14, 2006, http://www.dtic.mil/whs/directives/corres/pdf/130430p.pdf.

58 Thompson, "Army Recruiting More Dropouts."

59 Young and White, "Preliminary Operational Findings From the Army's Tier Two Attrition Screen (TTAS) Measure."

60 DOD Instruction, March 14, 2006, http://www.dtic.mil/whs/directives/corres/pdf/130430p.pdf.

61 Jennifer Kavanagh, "Determinants of Productivity for Military Personnel," Rand Corp., 2005; http://www.rand.org/pubs/technical_reports/TR193.html.

62 "Army Recruiter Threatens High School Student with Jail Time," Democracy Now, August 7, 2008 (from which the following quotations are taken); http://www.alternet.org/story/94192/army_recruiter_threatens_high_school_student_with_jail_time/.

63 Damien Cave, "Army Recruiters Say They Feel Pressure to Bend Rules," New York Times, May 3, 2005.

64 "School Recruiting Program Handbook*, USAREC Pamphlet 350-13*, September 1, 2004 (from which the following quotations are taken).

65 Karen Houppert, "Military Recruiters Are Now Targeting Sixth Graders. Who's Next?," The Nation, September 5, 2005.

66 "Detailed Information on the Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps Assessment"; http://www.whitehouse.gov/omb/expectmore/detail/10003233.2006.html.

67 Andy Kroll, "Fast Times at Recruitment High," Mother Jones, August 31, 2009.

68 "Military Training Program for Teens Expands in US," Agence France-Presse, November 25, 2007.

69 Houppert, "Military Recruiters Are Now Targeting Sixth Graders. Who's Next?"

70 Mike McAndrew, "Teenagers, the U.S. Army Wants You," Syracuse Post-Standard, June 22, 2008 (from which the following quotations are taken).

71 ASVAB website; http://www.military.com/Recruiting/ASVAB/0,13387,,00.html.

72 Ibid.

73 "Reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 2001 (No Child Left Behind Act of 2001)"; http://www.notyoursoldier.org/section.php?id=13.

74 David Goodman, "A Few Good Kids?," Mother Jones, September/October 2009.

75 Robert Hodierne, "Concern Over US Army Recruitment," BBC News, August 23, 2006 (from which the following quotations are taken).

76 Jim Lobe, "School Military Recruiting Could Violate International Law," Inter Press Service, May 14, 2008.

77 Carrie McLeroy, "Army Experience Center opens in Philadelphia," Army News Service, September 2, 2008.

78 "Recruiting Center to Have Flight Sims, Video Games," Stars and Stripes, June 16, 2008.

79 Holly M. Sanders, "An Army of Fun," New York Post, June 15, 2008.

80 Kathy Matheson, "Flashy Army Recruitment Center in Pa. Mall Closing," Associated Press, June 11, 2010.

81 http://shutdowntheaec.net.

82 "Computer Games Liven up Military Recruiting, Training," National Defense, November 1, 2002.

83 Clark Boyd, "US Army Cuts Teeth on Video Game," BBC News, November 25, 2005.

84 Anne Broache, "Video Games in Congress' Crosshairs," June 2, 2006; http://news.cnet.com/Video-games-in-Congress-crosshairs/2100-1028_3-6079654.html#ixzz18ZzXU6HT.

85 Tom Leonard, "Boy Scouts Train for Badge in Anti-terrorism," Daily Telegraph, May 15, 2009.

86 Kevin Johnson, "Police Tie Jump in Crime to Juveniles," USA Today, July 12, 2006.

87 Damien Cave, "Growing Problem for Military Recruiters: Parents," New York Times, June 3, 2005.

88 Kelley Beaucar Vlahos, "Heavy Military Recruitment at High Schools Irks Some Parents," Fox News, June 23, 2005.

89 Donna Tam, "Eureka, Arcata Lose Youth Protection Act Appeal," The Times-Standard, December 18, 2010.

90 Lizza Minno, "Bushwick Teens Resist Recruiting," Indypendent, March 14, 2008 (from which the following quotations are taken).

91 Noah Shachtman, "OMG! Navy Calls MySpace Kids 'Alien Life Force' (And They Hate the War, Too)," Wired, September 28, 2007.

92 Michael Felberbaum, "Army Likes its Older Recruits," Associated Press, December 11, 2006.

93 "Slain Soldier Rejoined Army to Help Others," Associated Press, January 2, 2009.

94 David L. Teibel, "More Than 200 Gather to Honor Fallen Cpl. Gaffney, an ex-Tucsonan," Tucson Citizen, January 5, 2009.

95 Robert Smith, "Soldier Paid Tribute at Remembrance Ceremony," The Leaf-Chronicle, February 12, 2009.

96 Lisa Burgess, "Army Raises Maximum Enlistment Age for New Recruits from 40 to 42," Stars and Stripes, June 23, 2006.

97 Tom Vanden Brook, "Older Recruits are Finding Less Success in Army," USA Today, February 19, 2007.

98 Patrik Jonsson, "Newest Army Recruits: The Over-35 Crowd," The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2006.

99 Felberbaum, "Army Likes its Older Recruits."

100 Leo Shane III, "Army Reopens Retiree Recall Program," Stars and Stripes, August 14, 2009.

101 Ibid.

102 Vanden Brook, "Older Recruits are Finding Less Success in Army."

103 Shane, "Army Reopens Retiree Recall Program."

104 Felberbaum, "Army Likes its Older Recruits."

105 James Dao, "Older Recruits Challenge Army and Vice Versa," New York Times, June 17, 2009.

106 Vanden Brook, "Older Recruits are Finding Less Success in Army."

107 Aamer Madhani, "Schaumburg Man Served in Vietnam," Chicago Tribune, May 21, 2004.

108 "Army Accepting Older Recruits," Associated Press, August 19, 2006.

109 Brian MacQuarrie, "Older Recruits Fill Out Military," Boston Globe, October 23, 2006.

110 Felberbaum, "Army Likes its Older Recruits."

111 Ibid.

112 "Americans Living Longer, Enjoying Greater Health and Prosperity, but Important Disparities Remain, Says Federal Report," National Institute of Aging, March 27, 2008.

113 "Army Accepting Older Recruits," Associated Press, August 19, 2006.

114 "Military Draws Older Recruits," Detroit News, February 21, 2009.

115 Dao, "Older Recruits Challenge Army and Vice Versa" (from which the following quotations are taken).

CHAPTER 4: OUTSIDERS

1 "Militarization of US Immigrant Rights Movement Dangerous," Russia Today, May 26, 2010.

2 Bill Hendrick, "Troops' Deaths Bring Conflict Home," The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 23, 2003.

3 Film: The Short Life of José Gutierrez, Dir: Heidi Specogna, Atopia, 2006 (from which all unattributed quotes in the following pages are taken).

4 Walter LaFeber, The American Age: US Foreign Policy at Home adn Abroad, 1750 to the Present (New York, 1994), p. 546.

5 Ibid.

6 Ibid.

7 "Clinton: Backing Dictators was Wrong," BBC News, March 11, 1999.

8 Simon Crittle, "In Death, a Marine Gets his Life Wish," Time, March 28, 2003.

9 Jeordan Legon, "Fallen Marine Wanted to Give Back to Adopted Country," CNN; http://edition.cnn.com/SPECIALS/2003/iraq/heroes/jose.gutierrez.html.

10 Bryan Bender, "A U.S. Military 'at its breaking point' Considers Foreign Recruits," New York Times, December 26, 2006.

11 "Non-Citizens in Today's Military Research Brief," CNA; http://cna.org/centers/marine-corps/selected-studies/non-citizens-brief (from which the following quotations are taken).

12 James Pinkerton, "Immigrants Find Military a Faster Path to Citizenship," Houston Chronicle, September 14, 2006.

13 "Row Over War Veterans Facing Deportation From the Country they Risked their Lives to Defend," Daily Mail, October 25, 2010.

14 Bryan Bender, "Military Considers Recruiting Foreigners," Boston Globe, December 26, 2006.

15 "Many New American Citizens Are Foreign-Born Members of US Military," Voice of America News, September 11, 2009.

16 "Row Over War Veterans Facing Deportation . . .," Daily Mail, October 25, 2010 (from which the following quotations are taken).

17 "Latin Youth Defines Dream Act as De Facto Military Draft," Vamos Unidos Youth; http://teachersunite.net/node/555.

18 Max Boot and Michael O'Hanlon, "A Military Path to Citizenship," Washington Post, October 19, 2006 (from which the following quotations are taken).

19 "Non-Citizens in Today's Military Research Brief," CNA.

20 Mark Stevenson, "Recruiter Draws Ire for Entering Mexico," Associated Press, May 9, 2003 (from which the following quotations are taken).

21 Film: Yo Soy El Army: US Military Targets Latinos with Extensive Recruitment Campaign, Marco Amador of Producciones Cimarrón and the Center for Community Communications and Big Noise media collective; http://www.democracynow.org/2010/5/18/yo_soy_el_army_us_military.

22 Stevenson, "Recruiter Draws Ire for Entering Mexico."

23 Brian Spegele, "Mexican Citizen Died in Iraq Serving U.S., His Beloved New Land," Tampa Bay Times, May 26, 2009.

24 Wes Allison, "Foreign Citizens Help Shoulder Military Duty," St. Petersburg Times, March 11, 2003.

25 "Immigrants Become US Citizens Quickly Through Military Service," Workpermit.com, October 18, 2006; http://www.workpermit.com/news/2006_10_18/us/military_service_citizenship.htm.

26 Allison, "Foreign Citizens Help Shoulder Military Duty."

27 "Non-Citizens in Today's Military Research Brief," CNA.

28 Film: The Short Life of José Gutierrez.

29 "Reasons Why Hispanics Remain Underrepresented in Military, Despite Interest," Rand Corp., January 14, 2009; http://www.randproject.org/news/press/2009/01/14.html.

30 "Militarization of US Immigrant Rights Movement Dangerous," Russia Today, May 26, 2010.

31 "Latin Youth Defines Dream Act as De Facto Military Draft," Vamos Unidos Youth.

32 Jose Cardenas, "Recruiting the Undocumented for the Military is Proposed," Tampa Bay Times, April 27, 2008.

33 "Militarization of US Immigrant Rights Movement Dangerous," Russia Today, May 26, 2010.

34 http://www.cis.org/node/351

35 Mark Krikorian, "Green-Card Soldiers: Should the U.S. Military be Reserved for Americans?," National Review Online, April 22, 2003.

36 Virginia Heffernan, "Slipping Through the Cracks: Bin Laden's Mole," New York Times, August 28, 2006.

37 Documents obtained from the DOD by the author in 2008 through the Freedom of Information Act.

38 Rod Powers, "Don't Ask, Don't Tell—The Military Policy on Gays," About.com, May 5, 2010; http://usmilitary.about.com/od/millegislation/a/dontask.htm.

39 "Gay Sex Immoral Says US General," BBC News, March 14, 2007; http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/6446815.stm.

40 "10 USC Chapter 37," February 1, 2010; http://uscode.house.gov/download/pls/10C37.txt.

41 James J. Lindsay, Jerome Johnson, E.G. Shuler Jr., and Joseph J. Went, "Today's U.S. Military is Still no Place for Gays," Washington Post, April 16, 2009.

42 Dahr Jamail, "Resisting Homophobia in the Military," Truthout, August 31, 2009; http://www.globalresearch.ca/index.php?context=va&aid=14998.

43 "Bi-Partisan Poll of Iraq & Afghanistan Vets," Vet Voice Foundation, March 15, 2010; http://www.vetvoicefoundation.com/new?id=0002.

44 Gary Gates, "Gay Men and Lesbians in the U.S. Military, Estimates from Census 2000," Urban Institute; http://www.urban.org/publications/411069.html.

45 Paul Steinhauser, "CNN Poll: 69% OK with Gays in the Military," CNN, February 22. 2010; http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2010/02/22/cnn-poll-69-ok-with-gays-in-the-military/.

46 "Services Gay Ban Lifted," BBC News, January 12, 2000.

47 "Gays in Military not an Issue for Many Nations," Associated Press, July 12, 2009.

48 "Time to Review Policy on Gays in U.S. Military: Powell," Reuters, July 5, 2009.

49 John M. Shalikashvili, "Second Thoughts on Gays in the Military," New York Times, January 2, 2007.

50 "'Don't Ask, Don't Tell'? No, Sir!," Letters, New York Times, January 7, 2007.

51 "US Military's Gay Policy 'costly,'" BBC News, February 25, 2005; http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/americas/4296325.stm.

52 "Financial Costs and Loss of Critical Skills Due to DOD's Homosexual Conduct Policy Cannot Be Completely Estimated," GAO, February 2005; http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d05299.pdf.

53 Robert Burns, "Abuse of Gays Rampant in Military," Associated Press, February 11, 2009 (from which the following quotations are taken).

54 Jamail, "Resisting Homophobia in the Military."

55 Neela Banerjee, "Soldier Sues Army, Saying His Atheism Led to Threats," New York Times, April 26, 2008.

56 Jason Leopold, "Charges in Religious Lawsuit Against Army Detailed," Truthout, September 25, 2007; http://archive.truthout.org/article/charges-religious-lawsuit-against-army-detailed.

57 "Open Letter From Barack Obama to the LGBT Community," http://www.examiner.com/sex-relationships-in-national/obama-reaction-to-california-supreme-court-ruling-on-prop-8-nada?render=print.

58 Toby Harnden, "Barack Obama Heckled by 'Don't Ask Don't Tell' Protesters," Daily Telegraph, April 21, 2010.

59 "Stories from the Frontlines: Former Army Sgt. Darren Manzella," SLDN Website, May 19, 2010; http://www.sldn.org/blog/archives/stories-from-the-frontlines-former-army-sgt.-darren-manzella/.

60 Andy Birkey, "Judge Rules 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Unconstitutional," Iowa Independent, 10 September, 2010.

61 Amy Goodman, "Why Did Obama Fire Dan Choi?," Truthdig, August 5, 2010.

62 Chris Geidner, "Pentagon to Recruiters: Accept Applicants 'Who Admit They Are Openly Gay or Lesbian,'" Metro Weekly, October 19, 2010.

63 "President Obama Signs 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Repeal into Law," New York Post, December 22, 2010.

64 "Military: No Problems Prepping for End to 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell,'" CNN, April 7, 2011.

EPILOGUE

1 Flavius Vegetius Renatus, On Roman Military Matters (Red and Black Publishers, 2008), p. 34.

2 William Kristol, "The Defense Secretary We Have," Washington Post, December 15, 2004.

3 The original Latin is De Re Militari.

4 Vegetius Renatus, On Roman Military Matters, p. 6.

5 Edward Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (Wordsworth, 1998), p. 3.

6 Arthur Ferrill, The Fall of the Roman Empire: The Military Explanation (Thames and Hudson, 2001), p. 12.

7 Vegetius Renatus, On Roman Military Matters, p. 11.

8 Ibid.

9 Ferrill, The Fall of the Roman Empire: The Military Explanation, p. 152.

10 Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, p. 9.

11 Ibid.
12 Ferrill, The Fall of the Roman Empire: The Military Explanation, p. 153.
13 Ibid.
14 Sun Tzu, The Art of War (Filiquarian, 2006), pp. 14–15.
15 Nicolo Machiavelli, The Prince (Penguin Classics, 2003).
16 Vegetius Renatus, On Roman Military Matters, p. 11.
17 "The Future—Is the Army Broken?," PBS, October 26, 2004; http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/pentagon/themes/broken.html.
18 "Rumsfeld's War," Transcript of Frontline program, PBS, http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/pentagon/etc/script.html.
19 "Daily Compilation of Presidential Documents, Obama, Barack H," August 28, 2010; http://www.faqs.org/periodicals/201008/2138532551.html#ixzz192xMsEst.
20 "Barack Obama Says US Troop withdrawal From Iraq Keeps Campaign Pledge," Associated Press, August 28, 2010.
21 Nisa Islam Muhammad, "U.S. Military Accepts More Ex-felons," Final Call, May 6, 2008.
22 Matt Kennard, "The US Army's Enemy Within," Guardian, July 13, 2009.
23 Claudia Núñez, "Mexican Drug Cartels Tied to U.S. White Supremacists," La Opinión, November 17, 2010.
24 "National Instant Criminal Background Check System (NICS) 2009," US Department of Justice; http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/cjis/nics/reports/2009-operations-report.
25 Mark Thompson, "How Marijuana Use Aborted Jared Loughner's Military Career," Time, January 10, 2011.
26 Ibid.
27 Matthew Kennard, "Saddam Was Well-regarded by British," Financial Times, January 1, 2010.
28 "Behind the War on Iraq," Research Unit for Political Economy, Monthly Review, Vol. 55, May 2003.
29 "UK Military Deaths in Afghanistan and Iraq," BBC News, April 2, 2012.
30 "BNP Claim Wide Army Support," Press Association, October 20, 2009.
31 Michael Savage, "Is the Army Losing its War Against Drug Abuse?," Independent, March 15, 2010.
32 Ibid.
33 Alastair Jamieson, "One in Seven Soldiers Driven to Alcohol by War Horror," Daily Telegraph, May 13, 2010.
34 Ethan Watters, "The Invisible Division: US Soldiers are Seven Times as Likely as UK Troops to Develop Post-traumatic Stress," Independent, April 8, 2011.
35 "Two Percent of Afghan-based German Troops Return Home Traumatized," IRNA, April 6, 2011.

36 Claire Ellicott, "Thousands of British Troops are Too Fat to be Deployed to Afghanistan, Reveals Leaked Army Memo," Daily Mail, August 3, 2009.

37 Aled Thomas and Nico Hines, "British Military Steps up Fightback Against BNP After Griffin Tirade," Times, October 21, 2009.

38 Chris Hedges and Laila Al-Arian, "'The Carnage, the Blown-up Bodies I Saw . . . Why? What Was This For?,'" Guardian, July 13, 2007.

39 Wikileaks War Logs; www.wikileaks.ch.

40 Jim Lobe, "Majority Still Believe in Iraq's WMD, al-Qaeda Ties," IPS, April 22, 2004.

41 Alex Barker, "Security Chief Exposes Blair's Gamble on Iraq," Financial Times, July 20, 2010.

42 Brad Knickerbocker, "Gates's Warning: Avoid Land War in Asia, Middle East, and Africa," The Christian Science Monitor, February 26, 2011.

43 Lauren Finnegan, "Army Boss Cautions Against 'Hollowing' Out of Armed Forces," Yahoo News, February 25, 2011.

44 Charley Keyes, "Obama Unveils Plans for Pared-down Military," CNN, January 5, 2012, http://www.cnn.com/2012/01/05/politics/pentagon-strategy-shift/index.html.

45 "US Embassy Cables: Verdict on the Leaks About the Middle East," Guardian, November 29, 2010.

46 Sun Tzu, The Art of War, p. 9.

47 Ibid., p. 15.

48 Michael Dobbs, "With Albright, Clinton Accepts New U.S. Role," Washington Post, December 8, 2006.

49 Neil Mackay, "Lets Not Forget: Bush Planned Iraq 'Regime Change' Before Becoming President," Information Clearing House, September 15, 2002.

50 Michael Mann, Incoherent Empire (Verso, 2003), p. 27..

Index

Abu Ghraib prison, 31, 91–2, 203
ACLU. See American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) ADHD. See attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) addiction. See alcoholism; drug abuse and addiction advertising campaigns, 152
Afghanistan, 34, 38, 40, 121, 123; drinking, 96; drug trafficking, 66, 98; friendly fire casualties, 100; massacres, 108, 212; NATO in, 9; Obama policy, 202, 214; obese troops unable to be deployed in, 209; sexual assault, 87; UK casualties, 208; US casualties, 48, 65, 157, 214; US invasion/troop deployment, 3, 5
AFQT. See Armed Forces Qualification Test (AFQT)
African Americans, 146, 154–5, 219–22 passim; education, 137; imprisonment, 81; IQ testing, 142–3; neo-Nazi murder of, 17–18; Vietnam War, 179, 185 age of recruits, maximum. See maximum age
Air Force, US. See US Air Force
Air National Guard, 101
Akaka, Daniel, 112
Al-Arian, Laila, 211
Alaska Front, 46
Albright, Madeleine, 217 alcohol, 72, 74, 89–97 passim, 103, 107, 203, 208–9; as PTSD self-medication, 121, 222; sexual abuse and rape connection, 84, 85, 89, 96 alcoholism, 10, 92, 93, 103 aliens' permanent residency ID card. See Green Card
Allen, Oittis, 130
Al-Qaeda, 180
Amador, Marco, 165, 179–80
American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 150–1 amnesty, 172, 174
Amos, James, 195
amphetamines, 95, 99–100

Ancient Rome. See Rome, Ancient Anderson, Joseph, 82 anti-Arabism, 30, 47–8 antidepressants, 100, 105 anti-Semitism, 30, 32, 42 anti-smoking drugs, 102 antiwar protests and protesters, 17, 29, 31–2
Apodaca, Michael Jackson, 66
Arabs, 43. See also anti-Arabism
Árbenz Guzmán, Jacobo, 166–7
Arizona, 175
Armed Forces Qualification Test (AFQT), 141–2, 143
Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery (ASVAB), 148, 204
Army (US). See US Army
Army Command Policy, 20
Army Experience Center, 151–2, 162
Army Game Project, 152
Army National Guard, 46, 134–5, 157, 192
Army Physical Fitness Test, 131
Army Preparatory School, 128
Army Reserve, 9, 123
Army Substance Abuse Program (ASAP), 94–5, 115
Arnold, Larry, 149
The Art of War (Sun Tzu), 200, 216 Aryan Nations, 39–40 assassinations, 67
assault, 49–53, 68, 80, 188. See also sexual assault
Assessment of Recruit Motivation and Strength (ARMS), 127
ASVAB. See Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery (ASVAB) atheist soldiers, 189
Atkinson, Patrick, 167 atrocities, 72–5, 77, 211 attacks on civilians, 37, 72–3, 83, 108, 153, 203, 212. See also massacres of civilians attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), 150 attrition, military. See military attrition Auchey, Jared, 162
Austin, Texas, 45

Aziz, Abdullah, 220–1

Baghdad Zoo, 97
Bales, Robert, 108
Banks, Nathan, 130 banks and banking, 118–20
“barbarization,” 199, 204
Barco, José, 37
Barfield, Scott, 23, 40, 68–9
Barnes, Arron, 162
Barrio Azteca, 61
Bastien, Bruce, Jr., 37 Battles, Jurell, 60 beatings. See assault
Belkin, Aaron, 75
Bennet, Michael, 107
Berg, Jacob, 35–6
Berkley, Shelley, 106
biker gangs, 59
Black, Margie, 161
black Americans. See African Americans
Blackwater, 9, 41–2
Blood and Honour (website), 35
Bloods (gang), 68 body weight, 10, 11, 130. See also obesity Bogan, Daryl, 126 bonuses, enlistment. See enlistment bonuses
Boot, Max, 174, 175
Bostick, Thomas P., 81, 128
Boxer, Barbara, 109, 122
Boy Scouts, 153
Brabazon, Edward W., 114 brain damage, 116
Bremer, Paul, 5
Bressler, Louis, 37 bribery, 176
Britain. See United Kingdom
British National Party, 208

Britt, Maria, 135
Broder, Judith, 106
Brooks, Antoine, 92
Brownsville, New York City, 219–22
Burke, Susan, 87
Burmeister, James, 22
Bush, George W., 3, 7, 62, 112, 137, 148, 171
Bushwick, New York City, 154–5, 210
Bushwick School for Social Justice, 155
Butts, John D., 163

Camp Pendleton, 17, 169
Carpenter, Raymond, 134–5
Carrington, Stevery, 221
Casa Alianza, 167–8
Casey, George, 48–9, 214–15
Castillo Armas, Carlos, 167 casualties, Afghanistan. See Afghanistan: UK casualties; Afghanistan: US casualties casualties, friendly fire. See friendly fire casualties casualties, Iraq. See Iraq: UK casualties; Iraq: US casualties Caterpillar, 124
Celtic Knights, 45
Center for Naval Analyses (CNA), 171, 175, 178
Central Intelligence Agency. See CIA
Ceres, California, 63–4
Chaney, William, 160–1
Chen, Danny, 48
Cheney, Dick, 204
Chiarelli, Peter, 94, 159
Chicago, 57, 61, 65
children, 144–56, 171. See also high school students; orphans
China, 215, 217
Choi, Dan, 192
Chomsky, Noam, 25
CIA, 167, 181
CID. See US Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID) citizenship, 169–73 passim, 177 civilians, attacks on. See attacks on civilians civilians, massacres of. See massacres: of civilians

Civil War, 7, 175
Clinton, Bill, 167, 183
Clinton, Hillary, 66, 124, 153
Clodfelter, Mike, 8
Cloverdell, Harold, 40
CNA. See Center for Naval Analyses (CNA)
Cobra II (Gordon and Trainor), 4 cocaine, 66, 69, 101, 103, 208
Cockrell, Stephanie, 51–2
Cody, Richard A., 5 coercion of minors, 144–6, 151
Cohen, J. Richard, 42
Cold War, 217, 218
Coley, Phylicia, 147–8
Collateral Murder, 153 college education, 146–8 passim, 173 college students, 146–7
Colombia, 67, 69, 101
Colorado Springs, 37 community college, 173
Concerning Military Matters (Vegetius), 197–8 Connelly, Mark, 26 conscription. See military draft contract killing, 67
Convention on the Rights of the Child, 150 convicted felons. See felons
Cooper, Clarke, 195
Copas, Bleu, 181–2, 183
Copeland, Decquan, 219–20
Coppa, Selena, 119
Corley, Kevin, 67–8 counter-recruitment, parental. See parental counter-recruitment courts-martial, 51, 52, 59, 78, 79, 211, 212 cover-ups, military. See military cover-ups
Covington, Randy, 161
Crespo, Carlos, 125–6

crimes by juveniles, 153–4 criminal record. See felons; prior criminal behavior Curzon, George Nathaniel, Lord, 207–8

Davis, Jamal Rashad, 60–1
DEA. See Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA)
Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), 99–100
Defense of Marriage Act, 195
Defense Personnel Security Research Center (DPSRC), 19, 46 dehumanization, 48, 153 delayed enlistment program (DEP), 144–6 demonstrations and protests. See protests denial of reenlistment, 44
Denver Lane (gang), 68
Department of Defense (DOD): DPSRC, 19; drug-related spending, 101; Guidelines for Handling Dissent, 17; on homophobia, 187–8; intelligence testing, 141–4; JAMRS database, 149; lawsuits against, 189, 191–2; on obesity, 131; on "pharmacological landmines," 102; policy on extremism, 13; privatization, 1–2, 9; "Project 100,000," 8; Task Force on Mental Health, 109. See also Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA); "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy (DADT)
Department of Homeland Security (DHS), 38–9, 41
Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), 121, 122 deportation, 172, 173 depression, 104, 116, 117. See also antidepressants
De Vlieger, Michael, 104
Dilling, Russell, 161 discharge, dishonorable/"other than honorable," 118, 172 discharge for drug use, 93, 208 discharge for homosexuality, 182–3, 187, 190–1, 192 discharge for misconduct, 44, 76–7 discharge for obesity, 129, 130
Dominguez, Michael, 10–11, 12, 81–2
Donaldson, Ian Stuart, 15
"Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy (DADT), 182–94 passim, 201
Dooley, Tom, 185
DPSRC. See Defense Personnel Security Research Center (DPSRC) draft, military. See military draft DREAM Act, 173–4, 176 drinking. See alcohol; alcoholism

Driscoll, John, 123
dropouts, high school. See high school dropouts dropouts, military. See military attrition drug abuse and addiction, 10, 93, 103, 107, 221 drug counselors, 99
Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), 67–8 drug-related discharge. See discharge for drug use drug smuggling, 100–101 drugs, prescription. See prescription drugs drug trafficking, 63, 65–7, 97–100, 173, 204 drug use, 78, 82, 89, 97–8, 205, 208–9 drunkenness. See alcohol and alcoholism
Dunne, Tommy, 21
Dupree, Brian, 132

Eastridge, Kenneth, 37–8 ecstasy (drug), 101, 208 education, 133–44 passim, 169, 173, 177. See also college education educational waivers, 138
Eisenhower, Dwight, 166–7
Elliott, James, 102
El Paso, Texas, 61–2, 69, 70
Encore America, 151
Ender, Morten G., 203
English language, 169, 175, 177, 178 enlistees, ex-convict. See ex-convict soldiers enlistees, fat. See obesity enlistees, gang-member. See gang members enlistees, gay and lesbian. See gay and lesbian soldiers enlistees, middle-aged. See older soldiers enlistees, neo-Nazi. See neo-Nazis enlistees, non-citizen. See foreign citizens in UK military; foreign citizens in US military enlistees, parent-and-child. See parent-and-child enlistees enlistment bonuses, 9, 147
Esparza, Jaime, 60
ex-convict soldiers, 72–6 passim, 79–80 extremists. See neo-Nazis; white supremacists

Fain, John, 42–4
Faisal I, 207
The Fall of the Roman Empire (Ferrill), 199–200 fat soldiers and recruits. See obesity FBI, 29, 39–46 passim, 50–6 passim, 61–6 passim, 204, 213 felons, 10, 71, 74–82 passim, 173, 203 female soldiers. See women soldiers
Ferrill, Arther: The Fall of the Roman Empire, 199–200
Figueroa, Norma, 131
Filner, Bob, 119, 120, 172
financial crisis, 162–3, 216
firearms. See guns and gun ownership fitness, mental. See mental health and mental illness fitness, physical. See physical fitness
Fogarty, Forrest, 13–34 passim, 41–2, 49
Folk Nation, 60, 61, 69
Ford, Melvin, 222
foreclosure of loans. See loan foreclosure foreign citizens in UK military, 209–10 foreign citizens in US military, 97, 165–81
Fort Bliss, 59, 66, 68, 69
Fort Bragg, 18, 22, 39, 114, 128, 180, 182
Fort Campbell, 26
Fort Carson, 106–7, 115–16
Fort Hood, 45, 46–7
Fort Leonard Wood, 94, 111
Fort Lewis. See Joint Base Lewis-McChord
Fort Meade, 70
Fort Riley, 39
Fort Sill, 60, 68
Fort Stewart, 20, 22
Foster, Ronte, 121–2
Frank, Arthur, 126–7
Franklin, Lans, 222
Franklin, Richard, 222
Franks, Tommy, 3–4, 5
Freakley, Benjamin C., 178

Friedl, Karl, 126, 129 friendly fire casualties, 100, 144, 166
Frueh, Michael, 120

Gaddis, Brian, 139
Gaffney, Charles P., 156–7, 160, 205 gang initiation. See initiation (hazing) by gang members gang members, 10, 11, 23, 49–71 passim
Gangster Disciples, 50–3, 57, 69
Gareev, Makhmut, 98
Gates, Robert, 86, 108, 214 gay and lesbian soldiers, 181–95 passim, 209 GED Plus Program, 138–9 general equivalency degree (GED), 138–9, 143
Germany, 7, 30, 49–53, 96, 101, 209
Gibbon, Edward: The Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire, 198, 199
GI Bill, 147–8, 201, 202
Giffords, Gabrielle, 204
Giroux, Henry, 137–8
Glass, Hunter, 22–3, 56, 60, 63, 80
Gliebe, Erich, 43
Gonzalez Galeana, José Daniel, 66
Gonzalez, Irving, 144–6
Goodman, David, 149
Gordon, Michael, 4 graffiti, 40, 52, 53, 57–8
Graham, Mark, 107
Great Britain. See United Kingdom
Green, Steven D., 72–4
Greenberg, Neil, 209
Green Card, 176
Green Card soldiers. See foreign citizens in US military Guatemala and Guatemalan immigrants, 166–70 passim, 178
Guidelines for Handling Dissent and Protest Activities Among Members of the Armed Forces, 17
Gulf Cup of Nations, 123–4
Gulf War, 9, 10, 98, 173, 206
Gunn, Tom E., 28 guns and gun ownership, 70–1, 204

Gurkhas, 209–10
Gutierrez, José Antonio, 166–70, 178

Haditha massacre, 155
“hajji” (word), 47–9
Hall, Elton, 28
Hall, Jeremy, 189
Hammerskin Nation, 22, 26, 29, 34, 45
Harpham, Kevin William, 205
Hartford Courant, 114
Hasan, Nidal Malik, 46–7
Hassin, Munther Jasem Muhammed, 78, 211–12 hate groups. See neo-Nazis; white supremacists health, 125–33 passim health insurance, 113
Healthy Eating and Lifestyle Training Headquarters (HEALTH), 128 heat stroke, 132
Hedges, Chris, 211
Hempel, Nasser, 76
Henderson, Tamara, 154–5
Hensley, Michael, 83–4 heroin, 97–8, 221
Hernandez, Ernesto, 177
Hernandez, Osvaldo, 75
Herring, Willem, 26 high-powered weapons. See weapons, high-powered high school dropouts, 73, 133–44 passim high school students, 147–51 passim, 155, 173, 176–7, 219–21
Hill, Barron, 133
Hill, Jerell, 68
Hiller, Andrew, 187
Hispanic Americans. See Latinos
Hitler, Adolf, 26, 37, 47
Hogg, Jennifer, 185
Holdbrooks, Terry, 20
Holmes, Delano, 77–9, 211–12
Homeland Security Department. See Department of Homeland Security homelessness, 121–2, 167, 221 homicide, 78. See also contract killing; murder homophobia, 187–8 homosexuality. See gay and lesbian soldiers House Armed Services Committee, 81–2

HUD. See Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD)
Huerta-Cruz, Arturo, 177
Hussein, Saddam, 4, 91, 121, 206–7
Hutchinson, Nancy, 62
Hutchison, Steven, 158–9, 160
Hutson, John D., 77

Illegal Immigrant Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act, 173 illegal immigrants. See undocumented immigrants immigrant soldiers, non-citizen. See foreign citizens in UK military; foreign citizens in US military Imperial Klans of America, 33 imprisonment. See prison initiation (hazing) by gang members, 49–53 passim, 97
Inouye, Arlene, 176 Insurgent, 25
intelligence testing, 8, 11, 141–4
Iran, 66–7, 217
Iran-Iraq war, 206
Iraq, 40, 112, 121, 123, 167, 205–10 passim, 217–8; atrocities and murders by US soldiers, 72–9 passim, 83, 97, 155, 211; child malnourishment, 124; cost of war, 213; drinking, 95, 96; drug trafficking, 66, 100; gang members in, 50, 57, 70; gay soldiers in, 190–1, 195; Iraqi deaths as result of invasion, 214; neo-Nazi opposition to war, 32, 33, 34; neo-Nazis in, 21–37 passim, 41–9 passim; Obama policy, 202; oil fields, 216; rape and sexual assault by US soldiers, 73, 84–9; September 11 connection (public opinion), 212, 220; Stop the Stigma tour, 116; UK casualties, 208; US casualties, 65, 159, 165–6, 177, 179, 214; US development, 123–4; US invasion/occupation plan, 4–5, 7; US public opinion of war, 156, 212, 220, 222; in video games, 153; weapons trafficking from, 70. See also Abu Ghraib prison; Gulf War
Islamic fundamentalists/radicalism, 46–7, 180–1, 212–13, 217
Israel, 7, 32, 34, 186

Jacobs, Greg, 87
Jamail, Dahr, 188–9
Janabi, Abeer Qasim Hamza al-, 73
Janabi, Genei Nasir, al-, 83

Jay, Lisa, 116
Jefferies, Perry, 79
Jews, hatred of. See anti-Semitism joblessness. See unemployment
Joint Base Lewis-McChord, 108–9
Johnson, Daryl, 41
Johnson, Juwan, 50
Joint Advertising Market Research & Studies (JAMRS) database, 149
Jones, Jerome A., 52
JP Morgan Chase, 118–19, 120
Jumper, John P., 128–9
Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps (JROTC), 147, 150–1 juvenile crime. See crimes by juveniles

Karzai, Hamid, 108
Kenya: US embassy bombing, 1998. See US embassy bombing, Kenya, 1998
Killeen, Texas, 61
Kimball, Kyle, 127
King, Gregory Darnell, 60
King Faisal. See Faisal I
Knobloch, Jason, 99
Korb, Lawrence, 128
Kosovo, 9, 173
Kosten, Thomas R., 93–4
Krepinevich, Andrew F., 5–6
Krikorian, Mark, 180
Ku Klux Klan (KKK), 15, 17, 24, 27, 28, 33
Kunk, Thomas, 157
Kuwait, 57, 58, 66–7, 165, 166, 177

LaFeber, Walter, 166
Lamo, Adrian, 111–12
Landes, Sarah, 155
language, English. See English language language, racist. See racist language
Laredo, Texas, 67
Latin Kings, 56, 57, 67

Latinos, 144–6, 154–5, 174–9 passim; education, 136, 137; gangs, 56, 57, 64, 67; imprisonment, 81; IQ testing, 142
lawsuits, 86–7, 88, 113, 118, 119, 189, 191–2 length of service, 185–6 length of tour, 108
Lewis-McChord Base. See Joint Base Lewis-McChord lesbian soldiers, 185–6. See also gay and lesbian soldiers Leyden, Tom, 34
Libya, 214
Lieberman, Joseph, 153 lies and lying, 144–6 passim, 212 life expectancy, 161–2
Lilly, Truitt, 33
Lindsey, Robert J., 93
Lissis, Justin, 96 loan foreclosure, 118–20 passim
Lockheed Martin, 124
Log Cabin Republicans, 191, 195
Lorenzo, Joe, 132
Loughner, Jared, 204–5
Lowenthal, A. J., 153
Lukefahr, Aaron, 40 lying. See lies and lying

Machiavelli, Nicolo: The Prince, 200
Madar, Chase, 111
Mahon, Dennis, 27–9
Make the Road, 155
Maldonado, Victor, 183, 187
Managing Overweight Veterans Everywhere (MOVE), 131
Mann, Michael, 218
Manning, Bradley, 111–12, 188, 210
Manze, Sal, 117–18
Manzella, Darren, 190–1
"Mariel boatlift," 27 marijuana, 67, 82, 103, 205
Marine Corps. See US Marine Corps
Mariscal, Jorge, 179

marketing, 151–3
Marquette, Glenn, 144, 145
Martin, Trayvon, 41
Martinez, Eric, 144 massacres: of civilians, 72–4, 77, 108, 155, 167, 211; of fellow soldiers, 46–7 maximum age, 156–63 passim
McAfee, Lynn, 130
McAteer, Sheilagh, 37–8
McCain, John, 113, 201
McCann Erickson, 152
McCaskill, Claire, 94
McChord Air Force Base. See Joint Base Lewis-McChord
McChrystal, Stanley, 96
McCormick, Richard A., 91, 103
Macdonald, Andrew: The Turner Diaries, 16, 27
McHugh, John, 81
McNamara, Robert, 8, 139–40
McNinch, Douglas, 115
McVeigh, Timothy, 16, 27, 33
Meadows, Michael, 134 medical waivers, 12, 136, 205
Meehan, Martin, 80, 187, 210 mental health and mental illness, 10, 38, 78, 104–16 passim; drugs for, 100–2. See also depression; post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) mephedrone, 208
mercenaries, 180, 199, 200
Mérida Initiative, 66
Metzger, Tom, 24–8 passim
Mexico, 65–6, 67, 176, 177, 204. See also US-Mexico border middle-aged recruits and enlistees, 156–63
Midland, Texas, 66
military attrition, 10, 76–7, 140–3 passim, 184–5; of non-citizens, 175–6; of older recruits, 159. See also denial of reenlistment; discharge for drug use; discharge for homosexuality; discharge for misconduct; discharge for obesity; dishonorable/“other than honorable” discharge military cover-ups, 52, 54–5, 91 military draft, 6–8 Military Entrance Processing Stations (MEPS), 204–5 military police, 29–30, 92

Millard, Geoffrey, 48–9
Miner, Brett, 79 minors, recruiting of. See children misconduct discharges. See discharge for misconduct
Mohamed, Ali A., 180–1
Montez, Marc, 165
"moral waivers," 54, 74–82 passim, 86, 94, 107, 136, 203, 205 mortgage loans, 118–20
Morrisette, Bobby, 51 murder, 37, 46–7, 60, 106–7, 173; Afghanistan, 108–9; drug-related, 65, 66, 67; gang-related, 49–53, 60–1, 68; of gay soldiers, 188; Iraq, 73, 78, 83, 211–12; Japan, 97; by neo-Nazis, 17–18; not grounds for preventing enlistment, 75
Murphy, David, 186
Murray, Patty, 109, 113–14 music, neo-Nazi/racist, 15, 16, 30, 32, 43
Muslim soldiers, 221–2
My Lai massacre, 211

Napolitano, Janet, 39
National Alliance, 16, 25, 27, 38, 39, 43–4, 205
National Assessment of Education Progress, 136–7
National Defense Authorization Bill, 62
National Gang Intelligence Center, 40
National Guard, 9, 27, 28, 65, 70, 185; GED Plus Program, 139; mental health issues, 104, 123; Youth ChalleNGe program, 138. See also Air National Guard; Army National Guard; Patriot Academy
National Intelligence Council, 215
National Socialist Movement (NSM), 25–7, 33, 36–41 passim
National Vanguard Books, 43–4
NATO, 9 natural gas, 216 naturalization, 171–2
Naval Postgraduate School, 152
Navy, US. See US Navy neo-Nazis, 10, 11, 13–49 passim, 203, 205
Nepalese soldiers, 209–10
Nestor, Rivas, 159
Neutzling, Andrea, 84–6, 89

Newman, Tony, 103
New Saxon (website), 34–5
New York City, 75–6, 154–5, 210, 219–22
Nicholson, Alexander, 194
No Child Left Behind, 148–9, 155 non-citizen soldiers. See foreign citizens in UK military; foreign citizens in US military Norteños (gang affiliation), 64
North Atlantic Treaty Organization. See NATO
North-Williams, Aletha, 161
NSM. See National Socialist Movement (NSM)
Nutrition Research Council, 127–8

Obama, Barack, 2, 102, 113, 159, 201–2, 214, 215; gay/lesbian policy, 190–5, 201 obesity, 125–32, 136, 209
Offutt, William, 117
O'Hanlon, Michael, 174, 175 oil, 216
Okinawa, 40
Oklahoma City bombing, 1995, 16, 27 older soldiers, 156–63, 211 opium, 97 orphans, 167–8
Ortega, Steve, 70
Ortiz Cabrera, Ildefonso, 177 overweight. See obesity

Pace, Peter, 184
pacification, 218
Pahland, Lynn, 98–9
Pantoliano, Joe, 116 parental counter-recruitment, 154–6 parent-and-child enlistees, 161–3
Pasquale, Nick, 52–3
Pate, Russell, 130, 131–2
Paterson, David A., 76
Patriot Academy, 133–6
Patterson, Chris, 159–60
Paye, Dardar, 172–3

Peck, Steve, 122
Penrod, Christopher M., 220
Perez, Norma, 115 permanent resident soldiers. See foreign citizens in US military Persian Gulf War. See Gulf War Petraeus, David, 71 petroleum. See oil
Philadelphia, 151–2, 162
Phillips, Virginia A., 191–2 physical fitness, 125–32 passim, 136, 160
Pickens, Keith, 178
Pierce, William, 16
Pike, John, 12
police, 64–5, 69, 70–1, 75–6 posthumous citizenship, 172
post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), 31–2, 60, 83, 109, 114–23 passim, 172, 202; drug/alcohol abuse and, 94, 99; medications for, 100, 101; in older soldiers, 160; UK, 209; VA move to not diagnose, 115
Powell, Colin, 2–3, 4, 186, 217 preexisting mental illness, 108, 114 prescription drugs, 100–2
The Prince (Machiavelli), 200 prior criminal behavior, 107, 136 prison, 81, 138–9, 144. See also Abu Ghraib prison privatization, 1–2, 5, 9, 113, 180, 202, 203, 216
Project for the New American Century, 218 "Project 100,000," 8, 139–40 propaganda, 116, 169, 212 propranolol, 101
prostitution, 92, 97 protests, 155. See also antiwar protests and protesters Prozac, 105–6
Prysner, Michael, 47–8
Psychological Kevlar Act, 101
PTSD. See post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) public opinion: of draft, 8; of gay/lesbian service, 186; of Iraq war, 156, 212, 220, 222; of Obama, 202 race war ("Rahowa"), 16–17, 29 racial supremacists. See neo-Nazis; white supremacists racist language, 47–9

Radtke, John, 123–4
Rand Corporation, 116, 143, 179
Rangel, Charles, 7 rape, 72–4, 75, 80, 84–9 passim, 107
Raya, Andres, 63–4
Ready, Willing, and Unable to Serve, 136
Reagan, Ronald, 206
Rebuilding America's Defenses: Strategies, Forces and Resources for a New Century, 218 recruiter misconduct, 56–7, 144–6 reenlistment denial. See denial of reenlistment religion, 184, 189. See also Islamic fundamentalists
Retiree Recall program, 158–9
Rightwing Extremism (Dept. of Homeland Security), 38–9
The Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire (Gibbon), 198, 199
Ritchie, Elspeth, 109
Roane, Jonathan, 132
Robb, Thomas, 33 robbery, 46, 63, 70, 76
Robinson, Miguel, 49
Rodriguez, Rigoberto, 136
Roettinger, Philip C., 167
Rolan, Chris, 96
Rome, Ancient, 197–200
Roper, Billy, 26, 33–4
Ross, James Douglas, 38
Rumsfeld, Donald, 1–6 passim, 86, 91, 197, 203, 206, 215
Rush, Mark, 155

Salinas, California, 65
Sanford, Florida, 41
Saranga, David, 186
Sarver, Perry, Jr., 133
Sarvis, Aubrey, 193
Seahill, Jeremy, 2, 203
Schoep, Jeff, 36–7, 41
School Recruiting Program Handbook, 146 schools and students. See college students; community college; high school students Schoomaker, Eric, 107

Segal, David R., 82, 140, 160
Senate Armed Services Committee, 40
September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, 1–3 passim, 76, 156, 158, 181, 200, 212, 213, 220
Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, 118
Servicemembers Legal Defense Network (SLDN), 183, 187, 188, 193 Servicemembers United, 194 sexual abuse, 151
sexual assault, 79–80, 84–9 passim. See also rape Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office (SAPRO), 87 sexuality in marketing and recruiting, 151
Shalikashvili, John M., 186–7
Sharpe, Joe, 120
Shields, Kevin, 37
Shinseki, Eric, 4
Shultz, George, 206
Shwedo, Kevin, 156, 158, 160
Simon, Jennifer, 55, 56–7
60 Minutes, 190–1
Skillman, Becky, 133
Skrewdriver, 15
sleep deprivation, 99–100
Smith, Carter F., 47
Smith, Douglas, 23, 80, 177–8
Smith, Jason, 132 smuggling of drugs. See drug smuggling Snyder, Vic, 161 social networking websites, 34–6
Soldiers of Misfortune, 150 soldiers, older. See older soldiers
Solis, John, 139
Solomon Amendment, 148
Southerland, Darnell, 60
Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), 33, 36, 41, 42, 44
South Korea, 55, 85
spies, 180–81

statistics, 9, 65; drinking, 95; drug dependency, 98; education, 141; enlisted felons, 75, 79; far-right groups, 33; gang membership, 63; gay/lesbian soldiers, 184, 185–6; imprisonment, 81, 144; Iraq war deaths, 214; Latinos, 179; mental health, 117; misconduct discharges and denial of reenlistment, 44; non-citizen US soldiers, 172, 175–6; obesity, 125, 129–30; older soldiers, 159, 160, 161; population demographics, 162, 171; sexual assault, 87, 88; suicide, 106, 123; UK soldiers, 208; UK soldiers (foreign-born), 210; waivers, 82
Stelton, Ike, 6
Stiglitz, Joseph, 213 sting operations, 67–8
Stock, Margaret, 173
Stoleson, Jeffrey, 57–60, 66–7
Stop the Stigma tour, 116 street theater, 155 students. See college students; high school students substance abuse. See alcoholism; drug abuse and addiction suicide, 48, 94, 102, 104–6, 110, 114, 120; statistics, 106, 123
Sully, Leslie Ann, 162
Sun Tzu: The Art of War, 200, 215 swastikas, 19, 23, 25, 28, 40
Swenson, William, 103
Syria, 3, 66–7

Tancredo, Tom, 71
tattoos: gang members', 52, 55–6, 57, 59, 69; neo-Nazi/racist, 14–25 passim, 28, 31, 34, 37, 38, 47, 49 terrorism, 79, 180–1, 205, 212–13. See also Oklahoma City bombing, 1995; September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Terrorist Watch List, 42 testing, intelligence. See intelligence testing theft of military property, 39, 58, 67–8, 69–70, 98, 101
Thomson, Mike, 62
threats, 59, 79
360 Architecture, 123–4
Thurman, James, D., 80
Tijuana, Mexico, 176
Title III federal funding, 155 Tokyo, 97
torture, 31, 91–2, 203
Totten, Michael, 48

tour length. See length of tour
Trafton, Jodie, 98
Trainor, Bernard, 4
Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States, 212–13
Troop Recruit Improvement program (TRIM), 127–8
The Turner Diaries (Macdonald), 16, 27
Two-Tier Attrition Scheme (TTAS), 140–1
Turner, Jennifer, 151

Ugbogu, Olatunbosun, 97
Umm Kasr, Iraq, 165–6 undocumented immigrants, 173–6 passim unemployment, 117–18, 162, 216
uninsured veterans, 113
United Kingdom, 186, 206–10, 213, 218
United Nations, 9, 150
US Air Force: Fit to Fight program, 128–9
US Army: Command Policy, 20; marketing, 151–3; maximum age/Retiree Recall, 156–63 passim; obesity in, 127, 128, 130–1; school recruiting, 146–7; Two-Tier Attrition Scheme, 140–1. See also Army Game Project; Army Preparatory School; Army Reserve; Army Substance Abuse Program (ASAP); Assessment of Recruit Motivation and Strength (ARMS); Virtual Army Experience
US Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID), 44–5, 47, 54–5, 58–9
US Army Recruiting Command (USAREC), 23, 146
US Citizenship and Immigration Services, 171–2
US Department of Defense. See Department of Defense (DOD)
US Department of Homeland Security. See Department of Homeland Security (DHS)
US Department of Housing and Urban Development. See Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD)
US embassy bombing, Kenya, 1998, 181
US House of Representatives Armed Services Committee. See House Armed Services Committee
US Marine Corps, 6, 26, 28, 38, 40, 192; Body Composition program, 129; in Guatemala, 167; immigrant soldiers 165–70; medical waivers, 127; mental health issues, 104; waivers for felons, 79
US-Mexico border, 168, 175
US Navy, 152, 155–6. See also Center for Naval Analyses (CNA)
US Senate Armed Services Committee. See Senate Armed Services Committee US VETS, 122

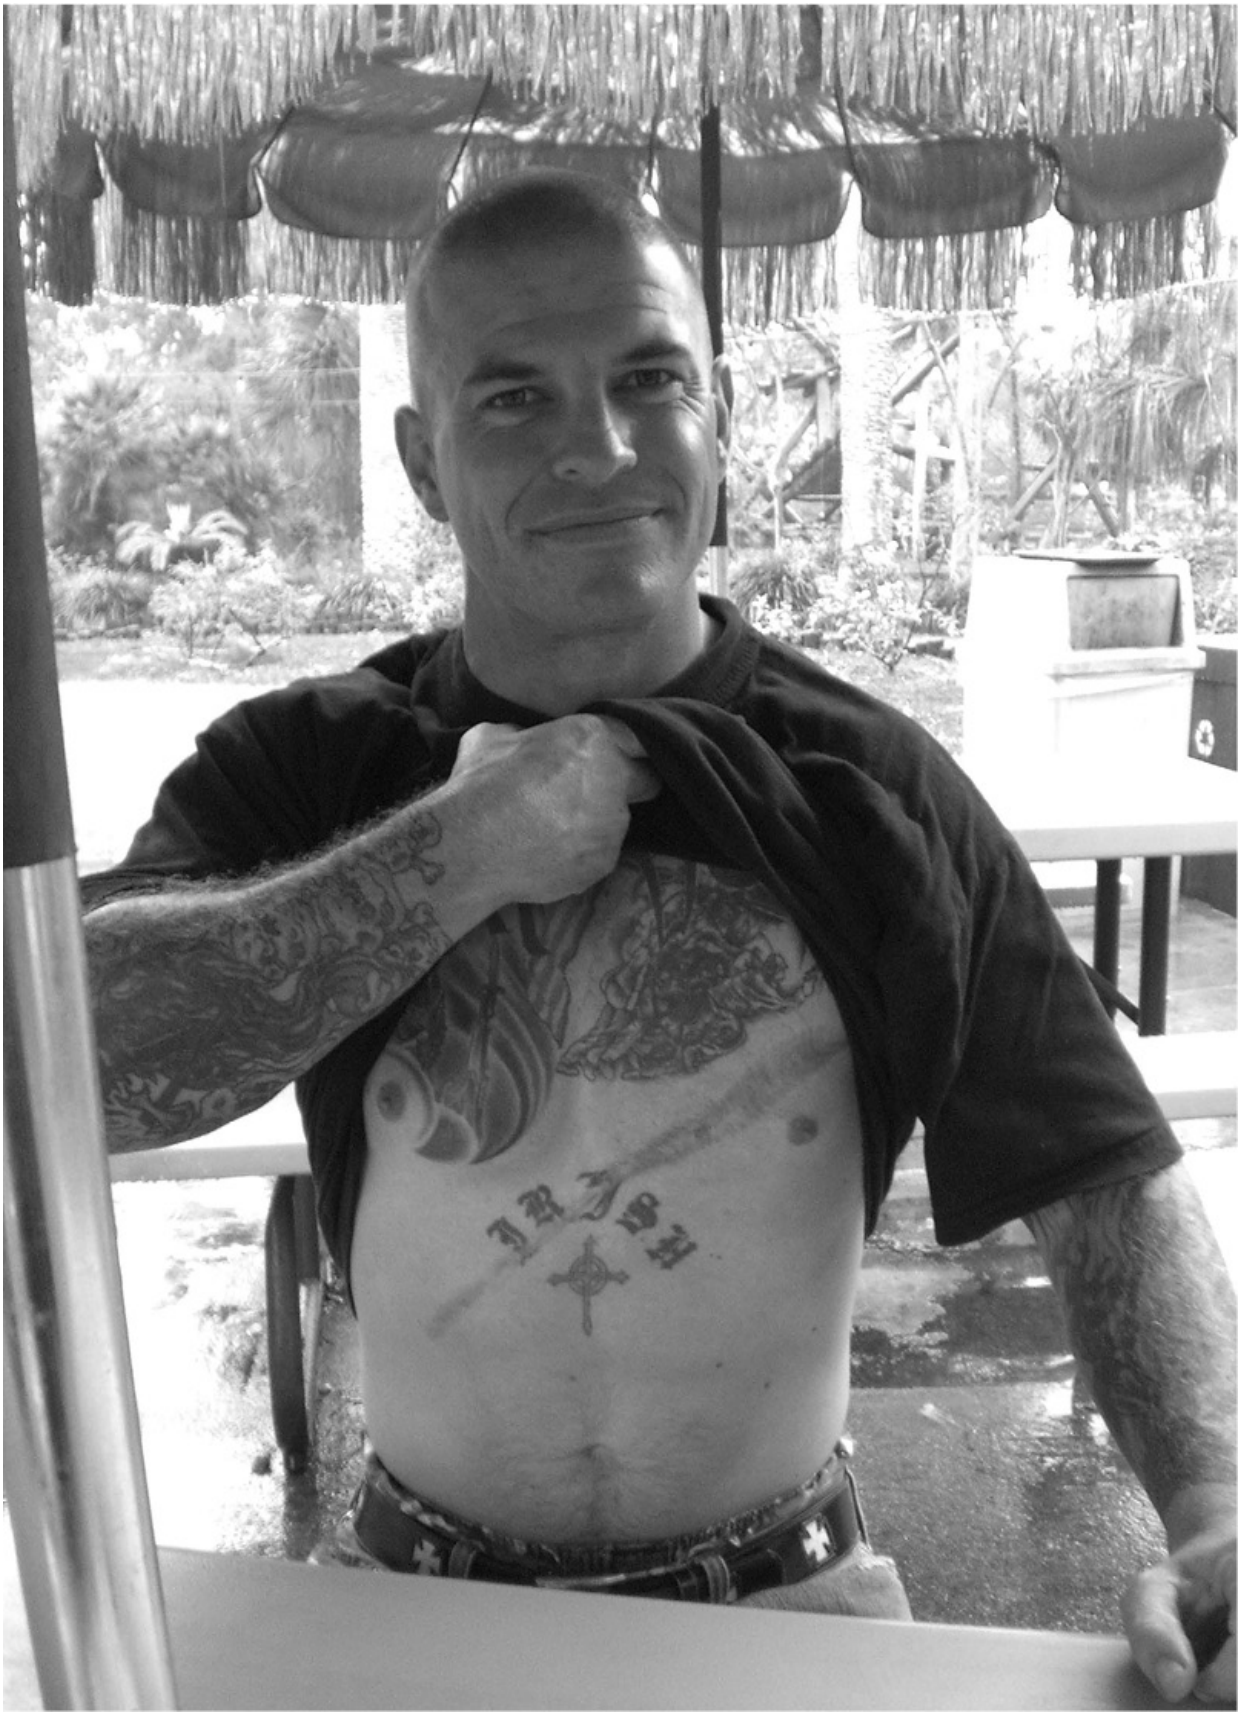
VAMOS Unidos, 174



Vaughan, Clyde A., 133
Vegetius, 197–8, 200–1
Vela, Evan, 83
veterans, 98–9, 211; as drug guinea pigs, 102–3, 201; health care spending on, 112–13; opinion of Iraq/Afghanistan wars, 202; opinion of gay/lesbian service, 185, 186; unemployment/underemployment, 117–18. See also Vietnam veterans
Veterans Administration (VA), 98, 101, 102, 112–15 passim, 123; housing scheme, 122; mortgage scheme, 120; obesity initiative, 131
Veterans For America, 99
Veterans Health Administration, 202 Vice Lords, 57 video games, 151–3 passim
Vietnam Syndrome, 216
Vietnam veterans, 117–18, 158–61 passim
Vietnam War, 6, 8, 110–11, 139–40, 179–85 passim, 218 violent crime, 153–4. See also assault; murder; rape Virgadamo, Travis, 104–6, 108
Virtual Army Experience, 153

waivers. See educational waivers; medical waivers; "moral waivers"; weight-exclusion waivers Walters, Edward, 151
Watt, Justin, 73, 210
Waxman, Henry A., 79–80, 210 weapons, high-powered, 69–71
Webb, Jim, 201
Webb, Tyrone, 118 weight, body. See body weight weight-exclusion waivers, 130
Weinberger, Caspar, 17
Wells Fargo, 119, 120
whistleblowers, 52–3, 57–60, 188, 210
White, Thomas, 201
White Aryan Resistance (WAR), 24, 25
White Revolution, 26, 38 white supremacists, 13–49 passim, 59
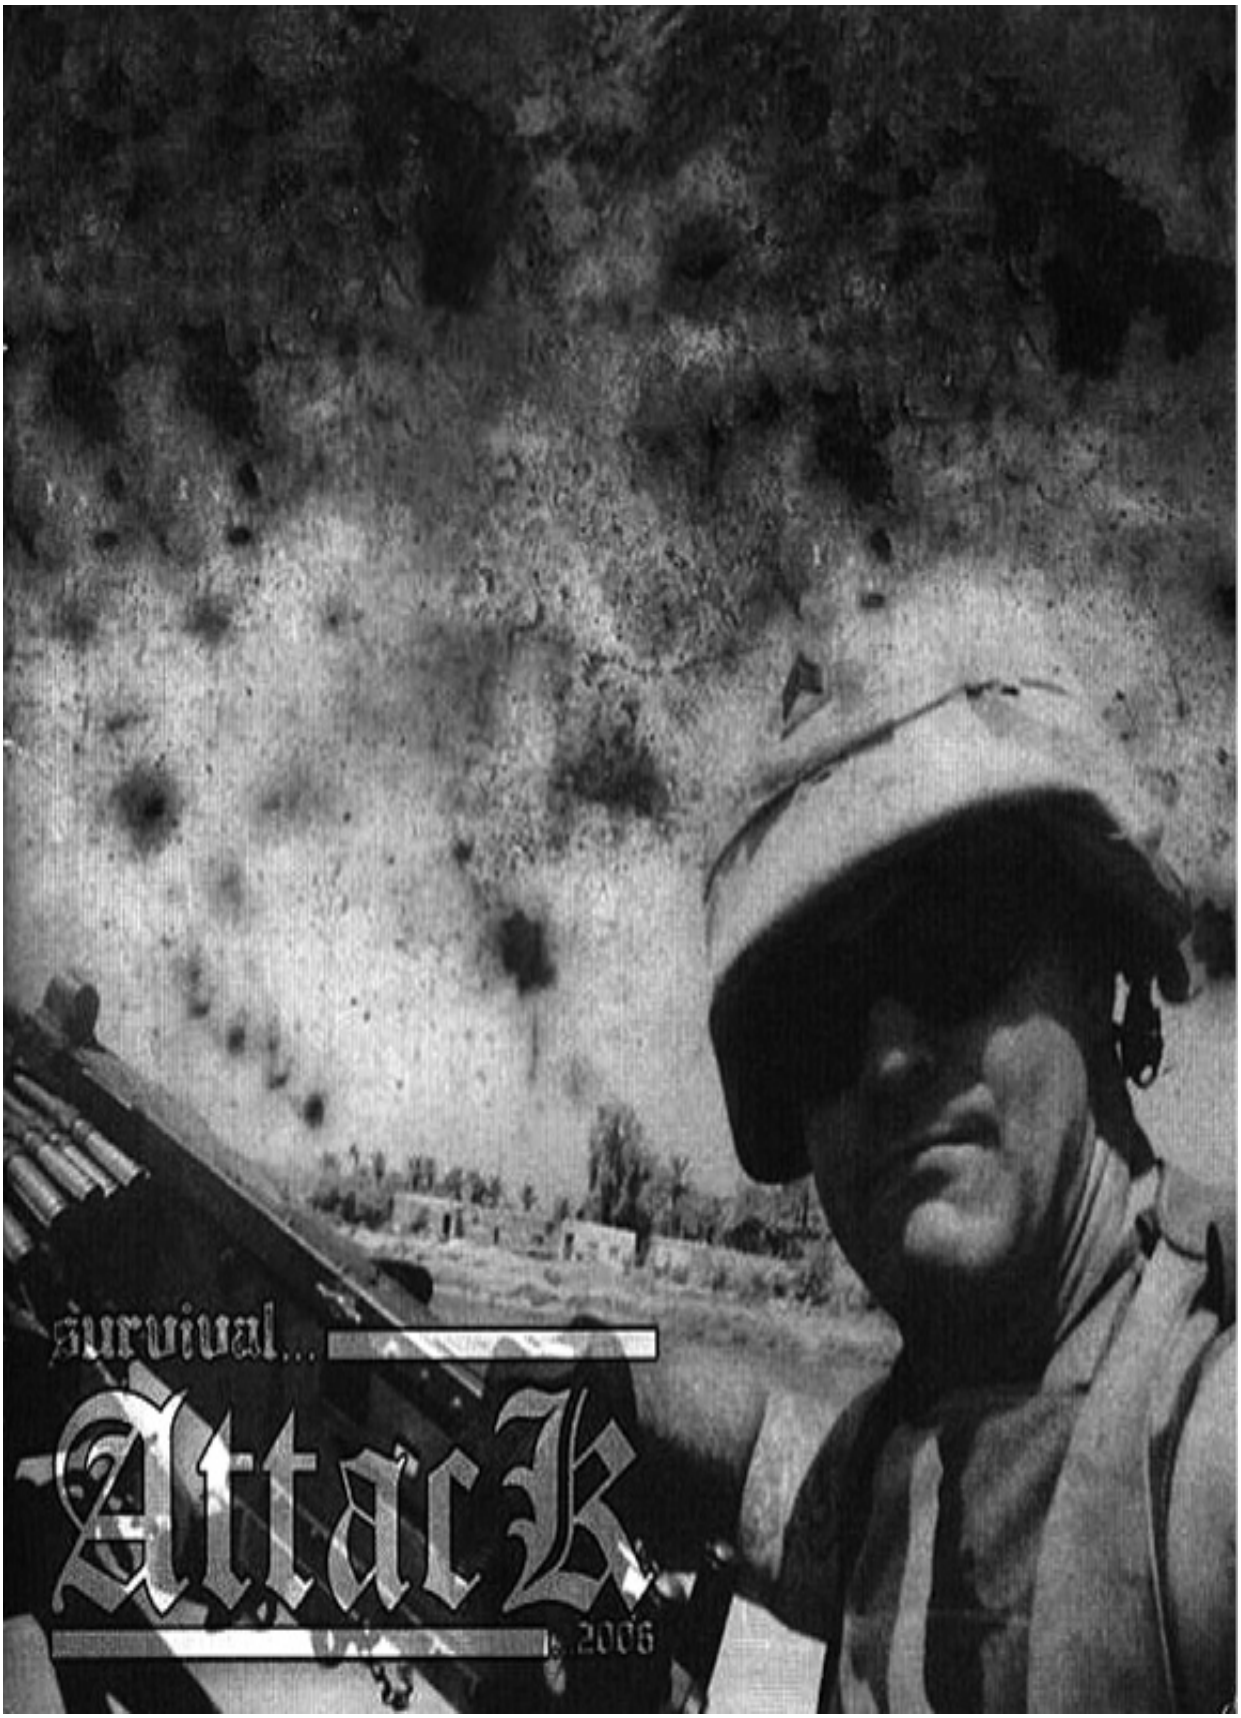
Whitley, Kay, 88
Wikileaks, 36, 111, 153, 211, 212
Williams, John L., 60–1



Williams, Rico, 50, 51
Wilson, Charles, 33
Wilson, Joe, 141
Wilson, Saskia, 220–1
Withington, Jonathan, 80
Wolf, Gregory, 38
Wolfowitz, Paul, 3 women soldiers, 80, 84–9. See also lesbian soldiers
Wood, Todd, 21
Wormuth, Christine, 77
Wrobel, Kyle R., 36

Young, Andrew, 127–8
Young Gorilla Family, 68
Youth ChalleNGe, 138
Youth Protection Act (Arcata and Eureka, California), 154 zero-tolerance polices, 137, 138

Zetas (drug cartel), 67
Zoloft, 100

JRJSH

Forrest Fogarty, neo-Nazi who served in Iraq as a part of the military police from 2004 to 2005. [Matt Kennard, March 2008] survival...

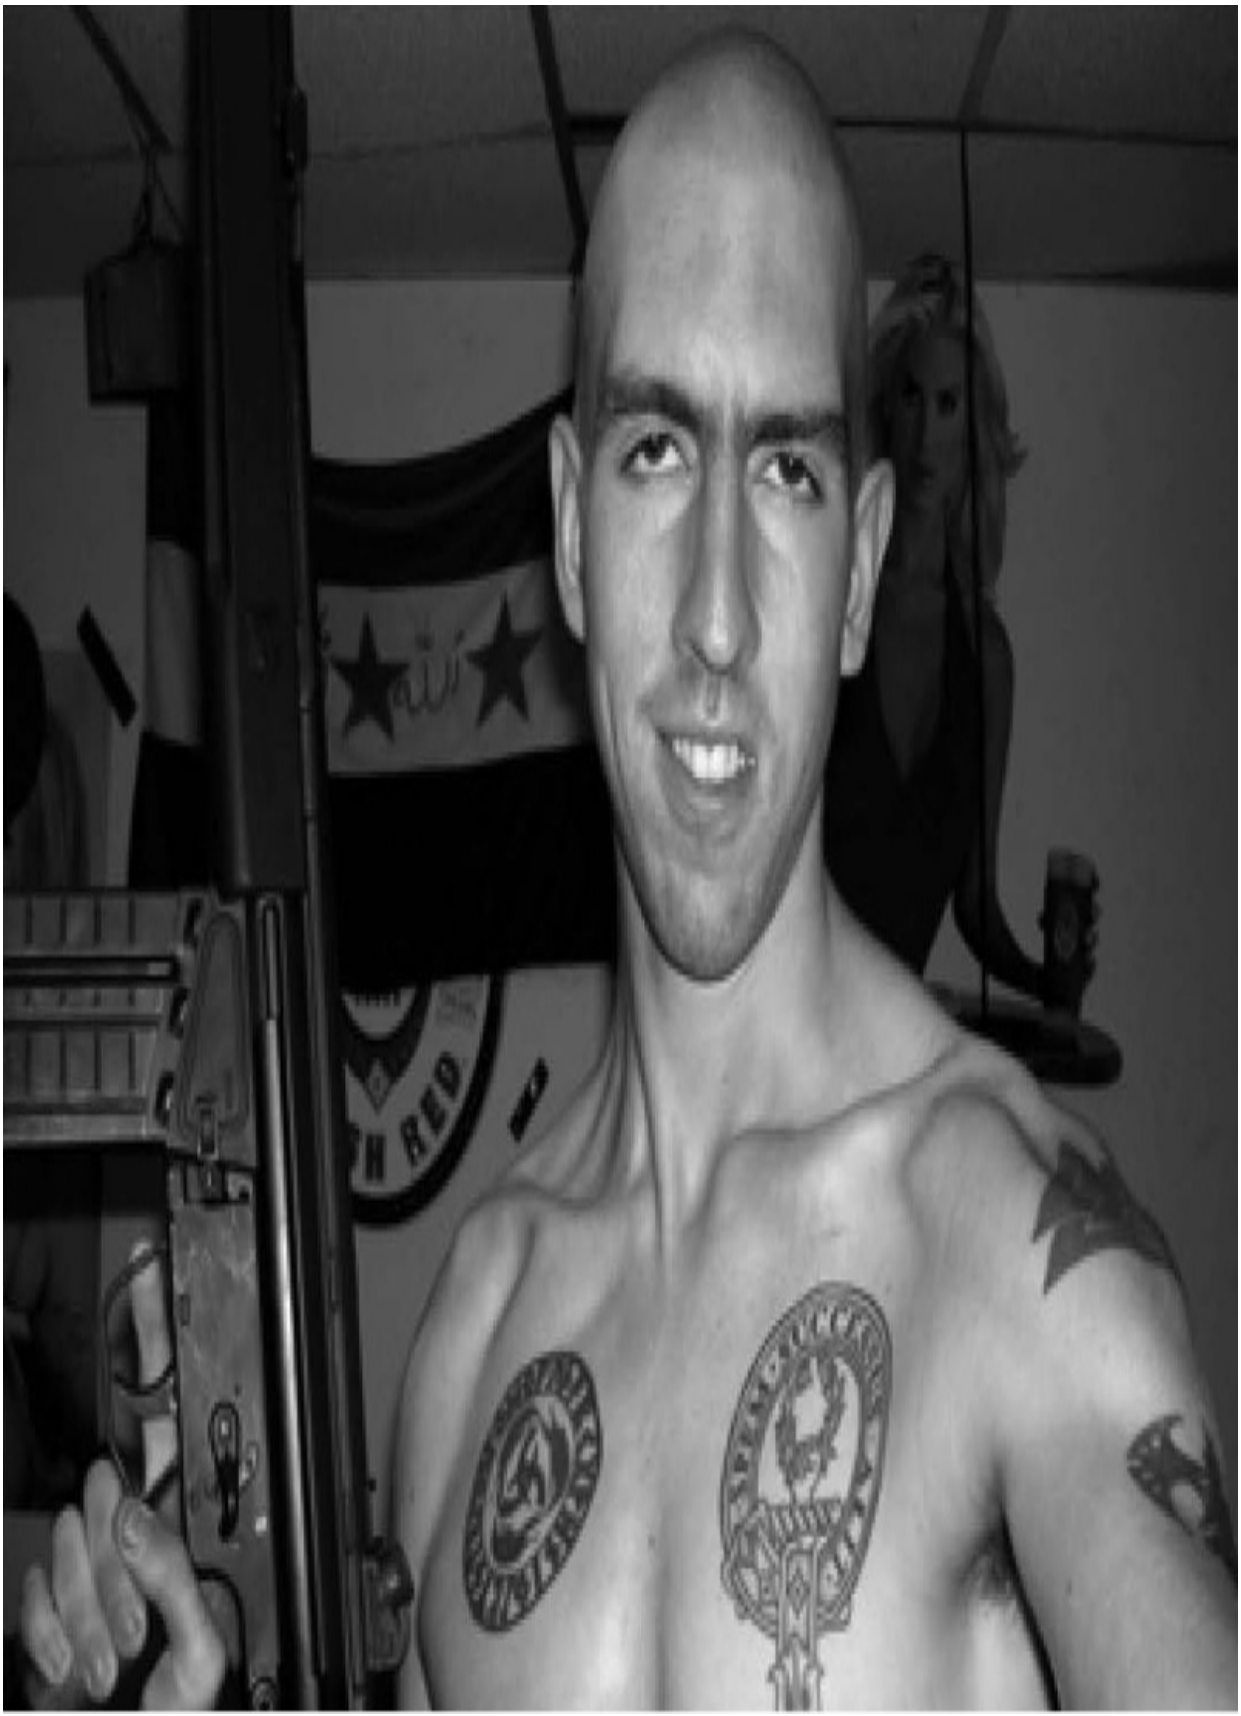
AttacK
2006

Fogarty in Iraq on the album cover of his neo-Nazi band Attack. [Given to Matt Kennard by Fogarty, March 2008]

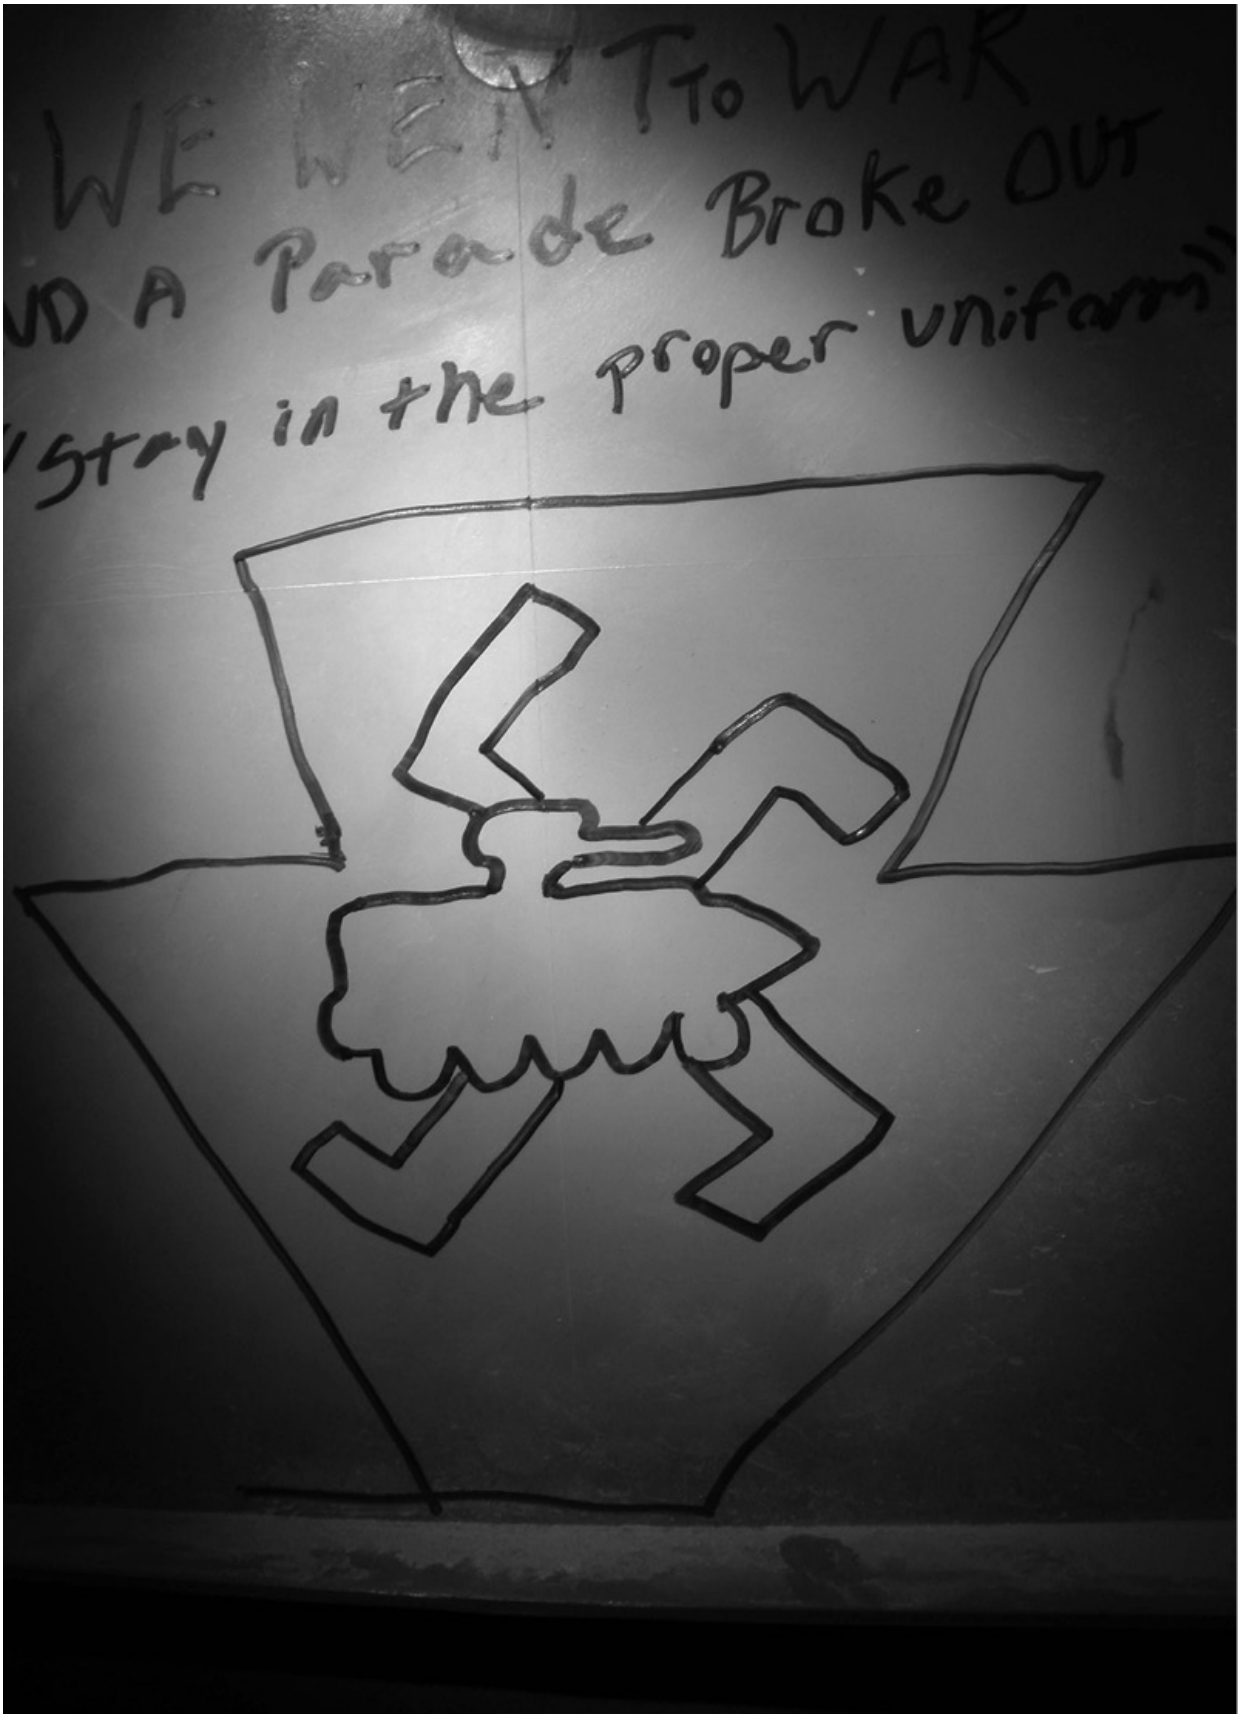


The Viking with axe tattoo riding up Fogarty's forearm. [Matt Kennard, March 2008]

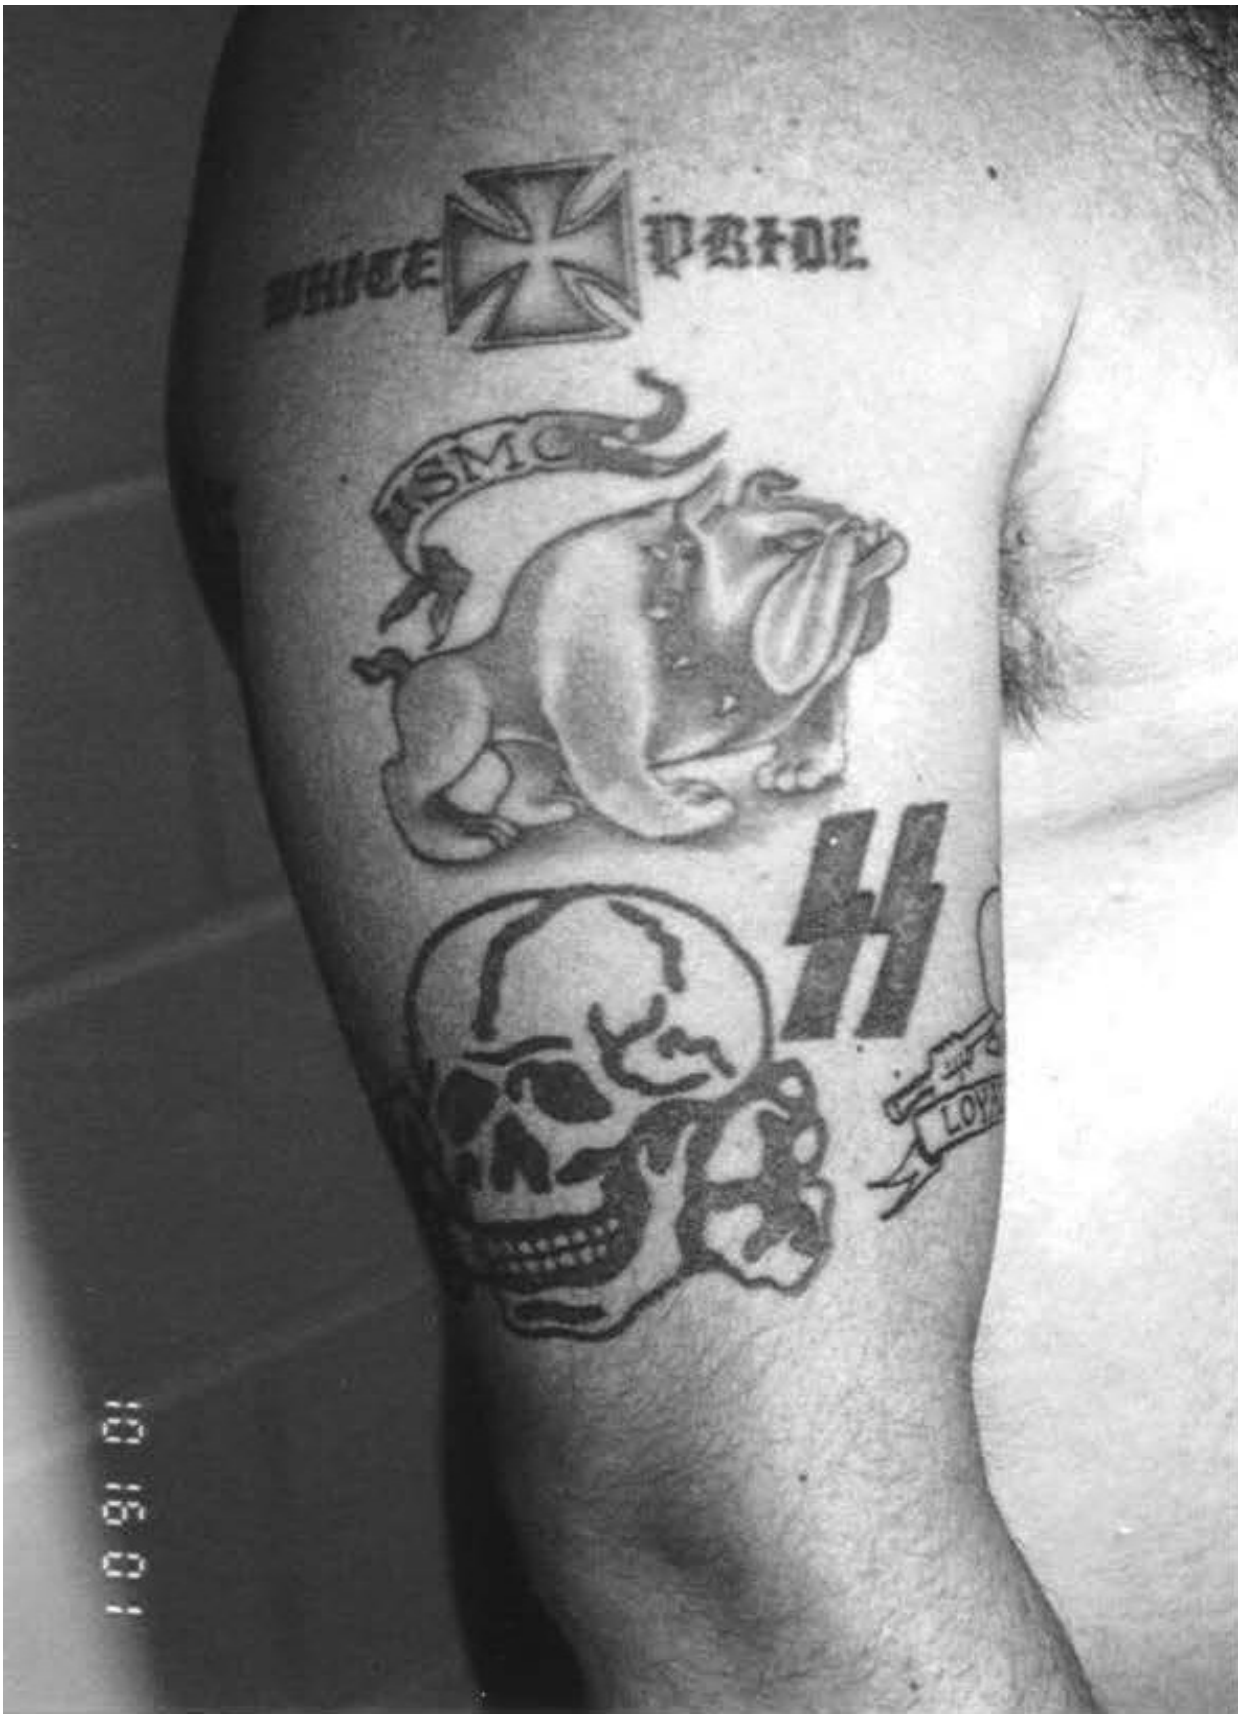
I Don't Mean To Be Rude

Specialist James Douglas Ross, who served in Iraq as a military intelligence offi cer (Eighty-Second Airborne Division) in his barracks room. [Photo provided by Hunter Glass]

James Douglas Ross's boots, complete with swastika treads. [Photo provided by Hunter Glass]



Ross in his room in Iraq, holding fully automatic rifle. He was eventually caught mailing a submachine gun back to his father in the US. The three-triangle tattoo on the top of his left arm is a Norse sign used by white supremacists. [Photo provided by Jeffrey Stoleson]



Neo-Nazi soldier in Iraq does Hitler salute on extremist social network NewSaxon. [Obtained by Matt Kennard, 2008]

Kenneth Eastridge, former soldier in Iraq now serving time for his part in murder of fellow soldier in the US, does Hitler salute and shows off SS bolts on right forearm. [Downloaded from Eastridge's Myspace page]

WE WENT TO WAR
D A Parade Broke OUT
Stay in the proper uniform

Neo-Nazi graffi ti put up outside Camp Taji in Iraq. [Picture by Jeffrey Stoleson]

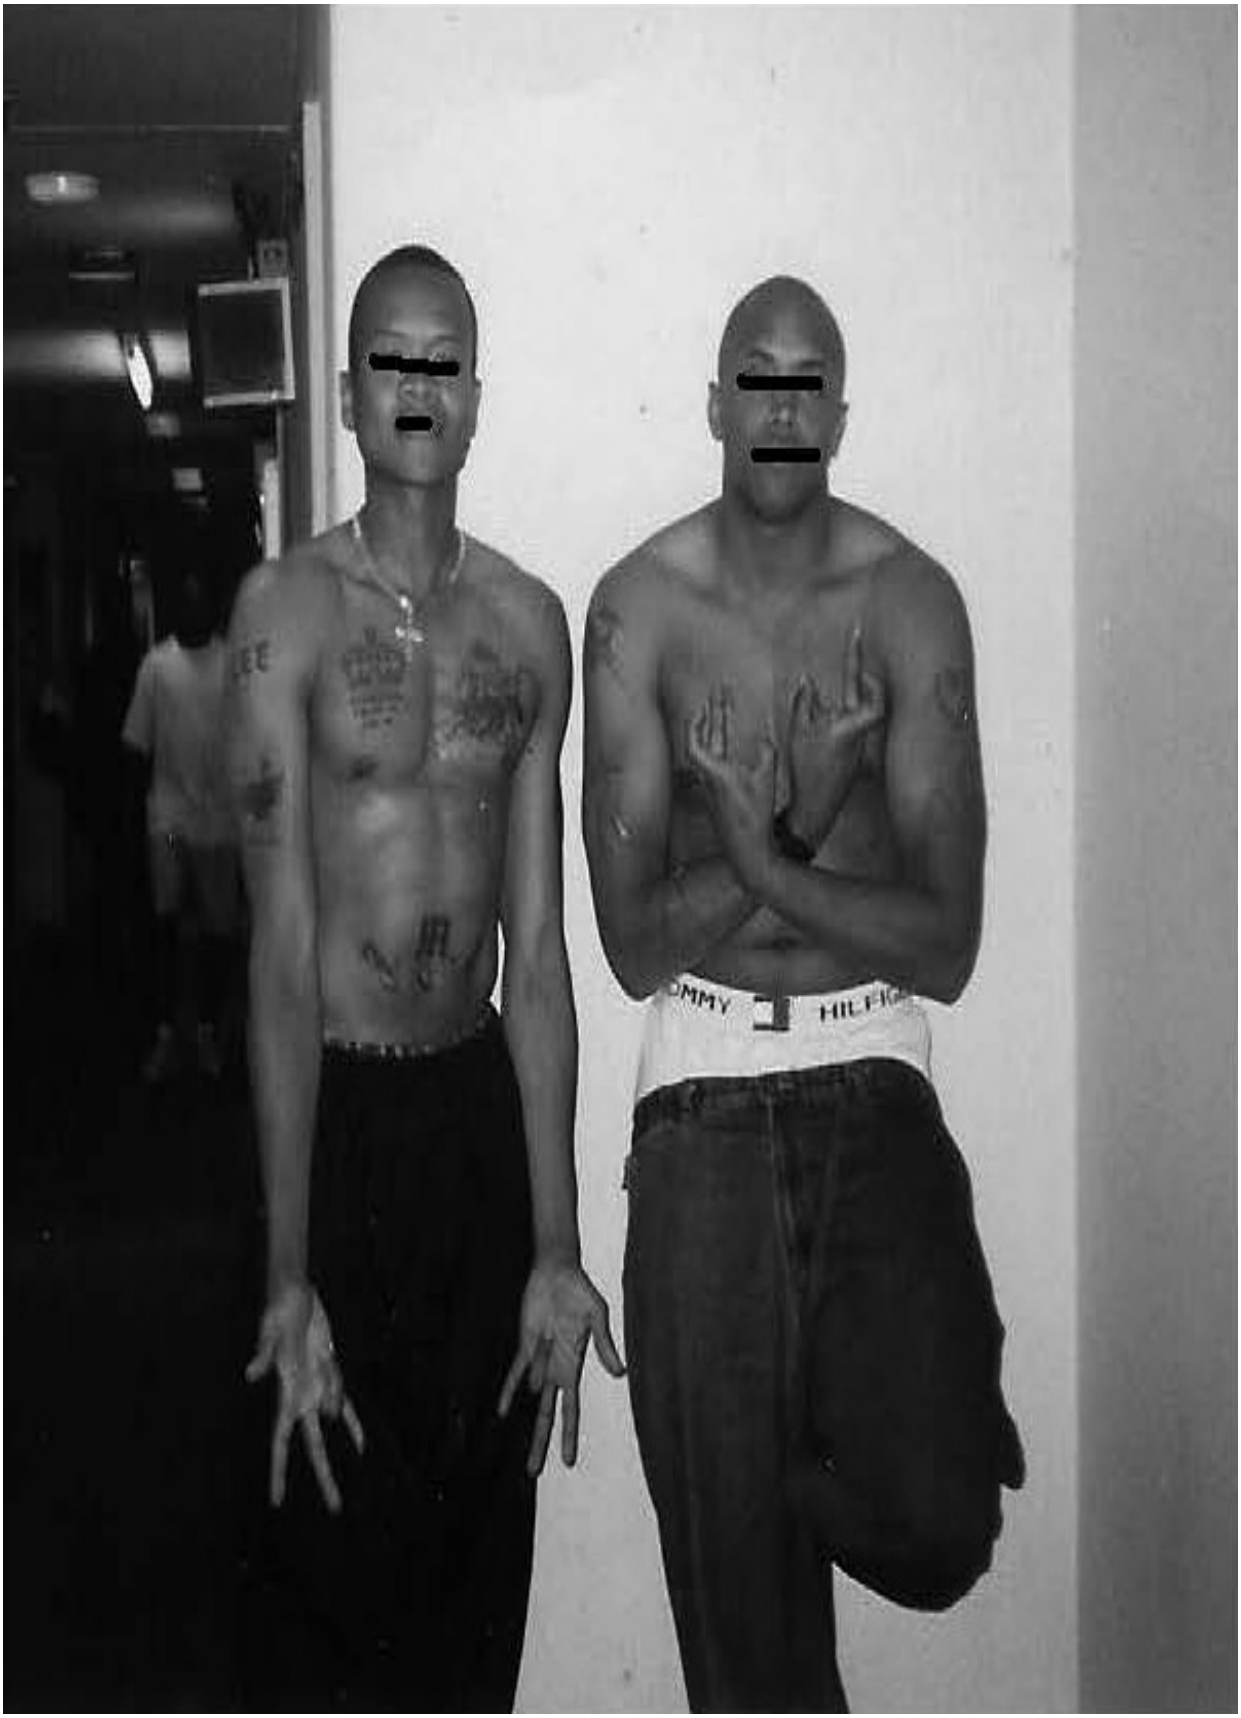
WHITE PRIDE
USMC

Skinhead marine with neo-Nazi tattoos who left military with honorable discharge and later went to federal prison after committing a hate crime in Montana. [Photo provided by T. J. Leyden]

Engineers

Private in an engineer battalion at Fort Bragg with a tattoo of the logo of Hammerskins, a group described as the “most violent and best-organized” skinhead outfi t in the US. The soldier told investigators he “didn’t know” the tattoo was racist and was allowed to stay in the military. [Photo provided by Hunter Glass]

Neo-Nazi swastika fl ag confi scated from billeting in Iraq in 2008 by military police. [Provided by Hunter Glass]



A US Marine scout sniper unit posing with neo-Nazi SS lightning bolts fl ag in Sangin, Afghanistan. [Widely available on the internet]

Gangster Disciple / Folk Nation
Pitchfork
Star of David (Barksdale)
Fear No Man
Common Gangster saying

Gang-tattooed arm of former airman Rico Williams, the leader of the gang that beat fellow soldier Juwan Johnson to death during his initiation into the Gangster Disciples while on active duty in Germany. [Photo provided by Hunter Glass]

Army cooks based at Fort Lewis, Washington, show their “west-side” gang allegiance. [Photo provided by Hunter Glass]

Two soldiers in their barracks on Fort Bragg, both members of the Gangster Disciples, a Chicago gang. The soldier on the right is throwing the pitchforks sign of the GD; the other is throwing the rival Latin Kings gang sign downwards in a show of disrespect. [Photo provided by Jeffrey Stoleson]

GUERA
Ghost
DIG
UER

Sergeant Jeffrey Stoleson sitting in front of a blast wall at Forward Operating Base Scania, two hours south of Baghdad, 2006. Graffi ti is for Diablos 69, a subgroup of the Norteños gang, based on the west coast of the US. [Photo from Jeffrey Stoleson]

EL MOCO

Stoleson at Forward Operating Base Scania in 2006. Graffi ti reads “El Moco,” the moniker of the individual that did the tag, while below is the name of Mexican gang La Eme (By the Wings), one of largest drug dealers and smugglers in the US. [Photo provided by Stoleson]

69'ERS

Photo taken in Taji, Iraq, shows graffi ti of outlaw motorcycle group 69ers, out of Brooklyn, New York, displaying their “1 per cent” patch on a tank. [Photo by Jeffrey Stoleson]

Photo taken in 2009 outside Forward Operating Base Anaconda, outside Balad, Iraq. The letters “BK” on the military vehicle denote “Blood Killas,” a tag put up by the Bloods’ rivals, usually the Crips. [Photo provided by Jeffery Stoleson]

HI
916 SAC TOWN
NORTE

Tank yard in Taji, Iraq, 2010. Graffi ti on tank spells out Sactown Norte, a criminal gang out of Sacramento, California. [Photo provided Jeffery Stoleson]

Gang warfare in Iraq. The Mexican prison gang Sur 13 put a line through the tag of a rival gang and replaced it with their own insignia. [Picture from Jeffrey Stoleson]

CLAIRE PROVOST MATT KENNARD

SILENT COUP

HOW CORPORATIONS OVERTHREW DEMOCRACY

BLOOMSBURY

'Silent Coup is a ground-breaking piece of work. Through personal journeys and encounters, it reveals the truth about how little our votes mean when corporations and dirty dealers are pulling their corrupt strings in the background. This book needs to be read aloud.

Silent Coup shows us where we're heading to if we do nothing. This book is not about theories, it's about reality. It's what real investigative journalism should be about, but it's written in a no-nonsense, engaging, and accessible style. This is stuff we really need to know.'

–BENJAMIN ZEPHANIAH

'Silent Coup shows us how corporations have insulated themselves from democratic decision-making and stolen our collective power. Through impressive and important investigative journalism, the authors reveal how, why and where corporate power has hijacked democracy.

We have to understand this world-spanning corporate power to build a global movement so powerful that we can take back our democracies and secure our collective future.'

–JEREMY CORBYN

'This brilliant book presents an entirely innovative framework to understand why the world looks like it does and not what it is. It explains why the media is largely ignoring the most important story of our generation. It explains how civic society around the world is being systematically dismantled by greedy corporations, governments, judicial bodies, and international institutions. It crackles by exposing hypocrisy at every level of officialdom. It demonstrates that voting in Western democracies is only the window dressing that hides power that few see with the naked eye but that this book reveals in startling and grotesque detail. If you read only one book this year, this should be it.'

–STEVEN DOZINGER

'Silent Coup opens a window onto multiple battlefields on which brave communities resist irresistible conglomerates worldwide. Because these momentous clashes remain under the radar of global public opinion, reading this book constitutes, in itself, an act of precious resistance.'

–YANIS VAROUFAKIS

'This wide-ranging inquiry – based on intensive on-the-ground investigation – unearths "a parallel world, outside of scrutiny…with very real consequences." An ugly world, out of control, unaccountable, but with overwhelming power. It ranges from investor-state legal systems to intricate systems of corporate welfare that aid elites and investors. Always concealed in elaborate devices of seeming to do good. Silent Coup is a highly revealing exposé of the hidden real world.'

–NOAM CHOMSKY

'Silent Coup is investigative journalism at its best. It shows us how corporations rule the world: suing sovereign, democratic governments in invisible courts to erode constitutions and the democratic rights they enshrine – and writing laws and treaties to privatise the earth's resources and public goods. Sovereign communities and countries are being displaced by sovereign companies and the supranational systems they have built to establish their control, creating in the process our age of corporate colonialism. The book is vital reading for all who care for human freedom, human rights and democracy.'

–VANDANA SHIVA

'Silent Coup is an outstanding work of secrets revealed: all the more so for its classic eyewitness reporting. It shows that democracy's true enemy is within, a dark alliance of rapacious capital and corrupt law. We have been warned.'

–JOHN PILGER

'Silent Coup is a crime story: a gripping description of the murky legal and regulatory structures and policy changes that privilege big corporations. It's a tragedy, outlining the terrible consequences for people and nature, for democracy and accountability. It's a lesson in economics, providing fascinating and important insights into the functioning of global capitalism today. But finally it's also a story of hope about apparently powerless people resisting these trends in the struggle for better and more just futures. Don't miss this.'

–JAYATI GHOSH

Silent Coup

How Corporations Overthrew Democracy

By Claire Provost and Matt Kennard

BLOOMSBURY ACADEMIC
LONDON • NEW YORK • OXFORD • NEW DELHI • SYDNEY

BLOOMSBURY ACADEMIC
Bloomsbury Publishing Plc
50 Bedford Square, London, WC1B 3DP, UK
1385 Broadway, New York, NY 10018, USA
29 Earlsfort Terrace, Dublin 2, Ireland

BLOOMSBURY, BLOOMSBURY ACADEMIC and the Diana logo are trademarks of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc

First published in Great Britain 2023

Copyright © Claire Provost and Matt Kennard, 2023

Claire Provost and Matt Kennard have asserted their right under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act, 1988, to be identified as Author of this work.

For legal purposes the Acknowledgements on p. xii constitute an extension of this copyright page.

Cover image © blambca/Adobe Stock

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or any information storage or retrieval system, without prior permission in writing from the publishers.

Bloomsbury Publishing Plc does not have any control over, or responsibility for, any third-party websites referred to or in this book. All internet addresses given in this book were correct at the time of going to press. The author and publisher regret any inconvenience caused if addresses have changed or sites have ceased to exist, but can accept no responsibility for any such changes.

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Names: Provost, Claire, author. | Kennard, Matt, author.
Title: Silent coup: how corporations overthrew democracy/
by Claire Provost and Matt Kennard.
Description: London; New York: Bloomsbury Academic, 2023. |
Includes bibliographical references and index.
Identifiers: LCCN 2022034526 (print) | LCCN 2022034527 (ebook) |
ISBN 9781350269989 (hardback) | ISBN 9781350269996 (epub) |
ISBN 9781350270008 (pdf) | ISBN 9781350270015
Subjects: LCSH: Business and politics. | Big business–Political aspects. |
International business enterprises–Political aspects. | Democracy.
Classification: LCC HD2755.5.P767 2023 (print) | LCC HD2755.5 (ebook) |
DDC 322/.3–dc23/eng/20220721
LC record available at https://lccn.loc.gov/2022034526
LC ebook record available at https://lccn.loc.gov/2022034527

ISBN: HB: 978-1-3502-6998-9 ePDF: 978-1-3502-7000-8
eBook: 978-1-3502-6999-6

Typeset by Integra Software Services Pvt. Ltd.

To find out more about our authors and books visit www.bloomsbury.com and sign up for our newsletters.

For Gavin MacFadyen, good trouble

Contents

Biographies xi
Acknowledgements xii

Introduction: The meeting 1

Part One Corporate justice

1 Democracy on trial 9

An unexpected phone call 9
Pacific Rim vs El Salvador 10
Dreams delayed 13
Independence day 16

2 Corporate courts 19

Out of control 19
Into the archives 22
El No de Tokyo 24
Follow the money 25

3 Secret insurance 29

Foresti vs South Africa 29
Marikana tombstones 31
The whole story 33
No angels here 36

4 Capitalist Magna Carta 39

San Francisco, 1957 39
A celebrity banker 40
More than just talk 43
New rules for the world 45

5 The boomerang 49

Vattenfall vs Germany 49
Totally absurd 51
Fed up in Hamburg 54
Coming home to roost 56

Part Two Corporate welfare

6 Aid-funded business 61

An unusual festival 61
The reality of aid 63
Margaret and Mahathir 65
One empire to another 68

7 Financing 'development' 71

Investing in empire 71
Billionaire beneficiaries 73
Washington follows London 75
The Queen's diamond 78

8 Buying power 83

No candles in Zanzibar 83
A new alliance for Africa 85
Your charity's c-suite 87
We're all partners now 89

9 Aiding elites 93

Corporate colonialists 93
Helping the 1 per cent 95
Welcome to the Shangri-La 97
Europe's Walmart 100

10 A new continent 103

Silent partners 103
Post-Soviet profits 105
Avocados and plastic surgery 107
We would have voted no 109

Part Three Corporate utopias

11 Fences up 115

Building control 115
Displaced in Myanmar 116
Frontier profits 118
Winners and losers 121

12 Irish invention 125

Bash on regardless 125
The middle of the world 127
Symbolic Shannon 128
Bad jobs 131

13 Rights suspended 135

Five days in Shenzhen 135
Sweatshop city 136
Union-free dreams 139
Cracks in Cambodia 142

14 Private cities 145

A CEO for your city 145
Clean air for sale 147
Private futures worldwide 150
Carving out London too 153

15 Finance is king 157

A fiscal paradise 157
Island of inequality 160
Mauritius mailboxes 161
Malawi mangoes 164

Part Four Corporate armies

16 Peace without democracy 169

A world government 169
Long-range plans 171
A monstrous blueprint 173
Dictatorship of flies 175

17 Profits versus peasants 179

Nightmares in Colombia 179
Challenging impunity 181
More hired guns 183
A militia in Honduras 185

18 Private borders 189

Occupation Inc in Palestine 189
Battle-tested products 191
Privatising Fortress Europe 193
Business behind bars 194

19 Private protection 199

Follow the weapons 199
Cattle in a camp 202
Informal imperialism 204
The new nanny 206

20 Lucrative threats 209

Secret city 209
Privatising Los Alamos 211
GOCO 214
Collateral damage 215

Epilogue: Ugly truths 219

Notes 223
Index 268

Biographies

Claire Provost is co-founder and co-director of the new non-profit Institute for Journalism and Social Change. She was previously Head of Global Investigations at the independent media outlet openDemocracy; a fellow at the Centre for Investigative Journalism (CIJ) in London; and a data journalist at The Guardian. This is her first book. She lives in Turin, Italy.

Matt Kennard is co-founder and chief investigator at Declassified UK, a news outlet investigating British foreign policy. He was a fellow and then director at the CIJ in London. He has worked as a staff writer for the Financial Times in Washington DC, New York, and London. He is the author of two acclaimed books: Irregular Army (2012) and The Racket (2015). He lives in London.

Acknowledgements

We would like to thank two people in particular without whom this book would not have happened. First, Gavin MacFadyen. The fellowships he gave us at the Centre for Investigative Journalism in London changed our careers and our lives.

The second is Tony Tabatznik at the Bertha Foundation which funded our fellowships. Like Gavin, Tony is a larger-than-life lightbulb of a human being. Few funders back projects which really take on entrenched power and change the world. Bertha is one of them. And, like Gavin, Tony does it all with an infectious laugh.

We would also like to thank all of the activists, human rights lawyers and countless others who are challenging the global systems and strategies through which corporations impose their will and limit the potential of democracy. The odds are stacked against them. Their courage inspired us and gave us the will to write this book. Their stories and wisdom should be much more widely known.

We would also like to thank our editors, and our families and friends – particularly Simone and Ana – for supporting us through the many years researching and writing this project. Finally, thanks to Ornella Maoret and Ann Page for their open-minded love and inspiration, and to Dylan and Rosa, the next generation where our hope lies.

Introduction: The meeting

He was late and seemed comically disorganized, but also purposeful and charismatic. Simultaneously out-of-place and at ease. From his attitude to his appearance – unkempt hair and a dark tweed blazer over a crumpled shirt – he was exactly how you might imagine a veteran, rabble-rousing American investigative journalist.

The scene was a small, busy restaurant in central London with walls that were covered in dark wood panels and a menu of rustic English meals. It was lunchtime on a weekday, and the dining room was packed with people on breaks from offices nearby, consumed in their own conversations. It seemed like an appropriate setting for a life-changing meeting of ambitious young reporters who wanted what this man seemed to have in spades: an impressive investigative track-record, but also a life of adventure, principles and a community of colleagues who were both 'trouble-makers' and close friends.

We'd only met Gavin MacFadyen once before – at our interviews for fellowship positions at the Centre for Investigative Journalism (CIJ) in London which he had founded in 2003 to create more space for important, and difficult investigative reporting.[1] But we'd read everything we could find about him and his history. He had covered civil rights and anti-Vietnam war protests in the United States, and the Nicaraguan Revolution, before moving to London and becoming more recently known for his vocal support of WikiLeaks and Julian Assange. We were excited to join his world of high-stakes, colourful characters. People who believed in what they were doing, and took real risks.

Gavin was a prominent friend to whistleblowers and reporters who seemed to run towards abuses of power. Previous CIJ journalists included Sarah Harrison, who became a WikiLeaks editor, and a close advisor to Assange, before helping Edward Snowden escape Hong Kong in 2013.[2] Daniel Ellsberg – leaker of the 'Pentagon Papers' – and members of the Russian feminist punk band Pussy Riot joined him in advising the new Courage Foundation on defending whistleblowers worldwide.[3]

He was also a fierce advocate for Chelsea Manning, the US army intelligence analyst who leaked files to WikiLeaks covering the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. They included a video which showed soldiers killing a dozen unarmed civilians – among them two workers for the Reuters press agency – and then laughing about it.[4] The price she paid was huge: imprisonment for seven years from 2010, sometimes on suicide watch, with detention conditions considered 'cruel, inhuman and degrading' by United Nations experts.[5]

These were the kinds of people that he seemed to be surrounded by. When they spoke about the role of public access to information in democracies it wasn't theoretical. Investigative reporting, Gavin wrote, demands 'a reporter's moral outrage at injustice, incompetence, brutality and misery'.[6] But for many journalists, he cautioned, their work 'is simply a job. Their interest is in lapdog confidences and dining with the powerful. Those who passionately want to provide a voice for those without one, and who fight hypocrisy and exploitation are sadly rare'. He fretted about consequences for the public-at-large, deprived of critical perspectives on the activities of powerful players in our societies. He, and those around him, were determined to do something about it.

We had both been selected for fellowships under Gavin at the CIJ after responding to a vague job advert offering two years of time and salary – and travel budgets – to work on public interest investigative journalism about, it appeared, whatever we wanted.

In our interviews, Gavin hadn't asked us standard questions, and hadn't wanted to hear much about our CVs or accomplishments. Instead he'd thrown scenarios at us. 'Imagine you get a tip,' he said. 'Rising cancer rates near an industrial waste dump. What do you do next, how do you figure out if there's actually a story there?'

He'd also thrown us curve balls, grinning as he quickly changed the scenarios' terms: 'Imagine, as you dig into this, you find out that a crucial environmental impact study had been buried, and that its author now wants this information to get out. But they're across the world, and they're worried about sharing anything over email. What do you do?'

Born on New Year's Day in 1940, Gavin would have been 74 years old – more than twice our age – when we met. He'd made more than fifty documentaries, including for the BBC and PBS Frontline, on topics ranging from neo-Nazi violence to election fraud. He also had a roster of acting and producer credits from a stretch of time that he had spent in Hollywood, including collaborations on Michael Mann films such as The Insider, which starred Russell Crowe as a famous corporate whistleblower.[7]

But while he had a lifetime of impressive experiences he didn't come across as arrogant or pretentious. We saw straight away that he lacked the ego and snobbishness of some senior journalists, who often seemed to disregard reporters who are much younger or who have just started to find their feet. He let out big belly laughs during our initial interviews which (unusually for job interviews) felt over far too quickly.

We were thrilled to learn that we'd been chosen for fellowship positions. Details remained sparse, but the start date was 'ASAP', and this was what had brought us to the restaurant that day. Gavin had suggested that we meet for lunch, presumably to discuss what our new positions would involve. As we waited for him, we compared the practical questions we'd prepared. We'd wanted to look organized before our new boss.

But when Gavin appeared and sat down at our table, he gestured at our notebooks and pens, and chuckled: 'Put those away.'

Instead of details, he wanted to chew over big questions that day. What were we passionate about investigating, and why? 'You can do whatever you want, go wherever you want – but make it count,' he encouraged us. 'You could even decide to work together,' he grinned. 'That could be fun.'

While we'd each met Gavin once before, at our interviews, we hadn't met each other and soon we realised that this was the purpose of our lunch. When it was our turn to speak we saw that this unusual meeting, without note-taking or an agenda, had in fact been carefully planned by the unusual character before us. We had too many interests, and concerns, in common. It could not have been a coincidence, we thought.

Claire had been working up the road at the Guardian, one of Britain's main newspapers, as a data journalist. Her work there had included investigations following international aid and development money – including how giant companies have profited from these budgets.[8] She wanted to dig deeper into this business.

Matt had previously worked at the Financial Times and had written a book about how the US military recruited neo-Nazis, gang members and criminals to fight the 'War on Terror'.[9] He had also been tracking controversies around international development institutions and had chosen as his next target a branch of the World Bank that invests in private companies. Claire knew it well; it was also on her list of entities to look into.

We didn't want that lunch meeting to end either – though we didn't get much new information about the fellowships that we'd been selected for. We would come to expect this mix of excitement and lack of clarity after a meeting with Gavin. However one thing was now obvious: he would not tell us what to do, not like a normal boss. He might inspire and give us some direction, but it would be up to us to make the most of this opportunity.

We didn't know it then but that lunch, in late spring 2014, set off a collaboration that would span many years and continents. We would go on to use every penny of our travel budgets and stretch them as much as possible: flying the most inconvenient flights, staying in the cheapest hotels, and wherever possible hitching rides with others going the same way. In total we went to twenty-five countries across Europe, Africa, the Middle East, Asia and the Americas – as well as deep into historical archives.[10]

What we found surprised even Gavin. As European empires crumbled in the twentieth century, power structures that had dominated the world were up for renegotiation. Yet instead of a triumph of democracy, what emerged was a silent coup against its very core – namely, the unstoppable rise of global corporate power and new infrastructure to protect it from rebellious peoples. Around the world, people on the frontlines of local struggles explained the present-day consequences of this epic power grab – while archives and historical documents revealed its origins. The result is this book – a guide to the rise of supranational corporate empires that now dictate how resources are allocated, how territories are governed, how justice is defined and who's safe.

Our first major investigation was prompted by an unexpected phone call. It sent us into a little-known but powerful international legal system through which giant companies and foreign investors can sue governments for billions of dollars. On the ground around the world we learned from local communities how cases through this system have challenged, delayed and in some cases overturned actions taken to protect public health and the environment and build more just and equal futures.

Next, we turned to the international aid and development system that we'd both wanted to dig into from the start – learning how it has helped corporations to expand (or bailed them out when they've struggled). Beyond corporate profits, we saw how these legal and welfare systems at the global level also support corporate control and influence over societies. We saw this too in our next investigations, into the cessation of territory around the world to corporations, as well as increasingly privatised security.

From South Africa to Myanmar (also known as Burma), these systems and trends have functioned to insulate giant corporations and wealthy elites from democracy – and, we learned from historical files and archives, this means they're working as intended. They are the product of ambitious and long-range plans to reshape the world.

This story is far bigger than a single parliamentary or congressional scandal (or series of them). It is about who really controls power and decision-making in our world today. The rules of the game. When exceptions are made. Who's in charge. It is about corporate justice, corporate welfare, corporate territories and corporate armies – all on a global scale. This is a story that affects you no matter where you live.

Though London, where we met, seemed increasingly like a particularly appropriate place for us to be based while working on this project. Each of the systems and trends we investigated had expanded around the same time. It was after the Second World War, as independence movements in poorer countries threatened the continuing rule of British and other imperial powers. Europe's capitalist elites, including senior figures from the UK and Germany, rallied to protect themselves and build new infrastructure to support corporations' interests. This infrastructure has since gone global – without democratic debates, and undermining democratic action worldwide.

Some of the figures in this story are well-known, including Cecil Rhodes and Margaret Thatcher, but many of the protagonists – the architects of international corporate empires and local community activists resisting their impacts – are not. The characters include English soap makers and Asian oligarchs as well as lawyers, bankers, economists – and, on the other side, a ragtag global resistance of people who would remind us of Gavin, with similar abilities to mix seriousness with joy.

Crucially, what we uncovered is not secret to everyone – elites know this story, or parts of it, already. So do ordinary people on the frontlines of local struggles globally. Their fight back has made them experts, but their views rarely inform headlines.

PART ONE

Corporate justice

Chapter 1
Democracy on trial

An unexpected phone call

Gavin gave us a room, to use as an office, in the media building at Goldsmiths University in New Cross, south London. It had no windows and had previously been used for storage. But we'd never had an office to ourselves before. We cheerfully tried to bring order to the chaos, stacking boxes of journalism training materials on one side of the room to give us space to sit. On a wall we pinned up a world map and big sheets of paper to start sketching out our ideas.

It was simultaneously thrilling and maddening to have no structure at all. Gavin ran the CIJ how we imagined an art school would have been directed in the 1960s, back when he'd been closer to our age. It was a peaceful refuge far away from the rapid churn of daily news – a place where there was space for 'the big questions'. It was also completely wild. Meetings were fun and had no agendas; fascinating friends of his would waft in and out.

Determined to make the most of our fellowships, we began by keeping regular office hours, meeting each morning and brainstorming the projects we could work on together. An unexpected phone call made us pack our bags earlier than we'd expected.

'September 15th, El Salvador's independence day,' Meera Karunananthan said down the line from Ottawa as we scrambled for a piece of paper and a pen to take notes. She was part of a global movement of 'water justice' activists and had been a contact of Claire's for years. Helpfully, she seemed to know about epic battles between communities and corporations, around the world, long before they became news (if they ever did).

'I wish I could go myself,' she emphasized. On that day, she explained, local community and environmental activists were organizing a 'Festival of Resistance' in a small town, north of the Salvadoran capital and near a very controversial proposed gold mine. They described the company behind the project as threatening the country's very independence with an international legal case at an obscure branch of the World Bank.

A hearing on the 'merits' of the case was scheduled for the same day, in Washington DC. The company was demanding more than $300 million in 'compensation' for not being allowed to dig up gold it found. It would be a huge penalty for the poor country to pay – more than it received in foreign aid each year.[1]

Meera described this case, as well as the context, in epic terms. An increasingly, impressively mainstream movement against mining, and to protect water resources, seemed on the verge of victory. New laws were being discussed and she thought that El Salvador could become the first country in the world to ban metal mining nationwide.

'It's the anti-mining capital of the world,' she said. But people leading this fight on the ground were doing so at great risk. In addition to the company's case against the country, local activists had faced death threats. Several had been killed.

'It's important that the world knows this story,' she encouraged us, with an intriguing blend of excitement and concern. International scrutiny, and on-the-ground witnesses, she suggested, could also help keep people safe.

We didn't need more convincing. After the call, we started to research flights to El Salvador. Then, also unexpectedly, Gavin appeared at our door.

'Wow,' he said. 'I like what you've done with this room!'

We removed a box of books from a chair, so he could sit down with us. We told him about El Salvador. He grinned. 'Great, get out of here, but do your homework first.'

Pacific Rim vs El Salvador

The international legal case against El Salvador had been launched by a Vancouver, Canada-based company called Pacific Rim. It was, we learned, what people in the industry called a 'junior miner'. It didn't have a massive empire, and was focused on exploring for new riches to dig up. The only real jewel in its crown seemed to be the proposed mine which it said the Salvadoran government had unfairly blocked it from opening.

We downloaded and printed files from the case from the World Bank's website. They ran into hundreds of pages, were heavy bricks of paper to carry around and were full of complicated legal language. But the company's argument was essentially that the Salvadoran government had encouraged them to explore for gold – and then, after they found it, prevented them from extracting it. They said they were owed compensation for the money they had spent on exploration activities, but also for their lost, hypothetical 'future profits'.

In response, El Salvador's lawyers said the company lacked key environmental permits it would have needed to dig – and proof that it held rights to all of the land it required. Many local farmers in the area, it seemed, had refused to sell their property.

A statement submitted to the tribunal hearing this case, by Pacific Rim's president, Thomas C. Shrake, helped us to further extend the timeline of relevant events. The company, he explained, had moved into El Salvador in 2002 after buying out another business that held exploration licenses there.[2] In the 1990s, we also learned, after the country's devastating twelve-year civil war ended, the government had courted international companies to set up shop. It had signed international treaties, and passed a new investment law in 1999, giving foreign investors access to international tribunals in case of disputes with the state.[3]

Much had changed, however, by the time the Canadian company filed its case in 2009. The environmental movements that Meera had told us about were already gaining greater momentum. A newly elected President, Mauricio Funes, announced a popular 'administrative freeze' on new mining permits.[4] All such permit reviews and approvals were put on indefinite hold, pending environmental and other studies. Environmental and human rights groups hoped that this would be followed by a permanent ban.

Three years later, in 2012, OceanaGold – a much bigger, Australian-Canadian, mining corporation – bought Pacific Rim for less than $10 million.[5] If it won the case against El Salvador that it had inherited in the process, it would make hundreds of millions of dollars in profit.[6] But, we were surprised to find, the company's own communications didn't seem to focus on this potential payout. Instead they gushed about 'unlocking the significant opportunity that exists' at the contested mine site.[7] Sam Pazuki, an OceanaGold communications representative, reportedly said the company's 'strong preference' was 'a negotiated outcome to the permitting impasse'.[8] No matter how unwelcome, it seemed, they wanted to dig.

We asked ourselves: Was its case a way to drag the government to the negotiating table? Would the World Bank, whose stated mission is to end poverty and boost 'shared prosperity', allow a company to threaten a poor country, for so much money, while being clear that they ultimately wanted to dig no matter what? And why hadn't this dispute been covered closely by the international media?

Its international dimensions were clear. The case had been mounted by a Canadian company, and then carried forward by a Australian-Canadian one; it had been registered at a World Bank branch in Washington DC; the tribunal judging it was composed of elite lawyers from Argentina and Europe. But with few exceptions, it seemed to have received almost no mainstream global media coverage.

We descended into the capital San Salvador late in the evening. It was dark but, as we were driven from the airport in a taxi, we thought about what road we were travelling on. It was likely the same one on which four US Catholic missionaries were stopped, raped and executed on 2 December 1980. It was an infamous atrocity. Years later, four National Guard officers were convicted for these murders. Afterwards, declarations they made from prison revealed that they were following orders from the US-backed Salvadoran authorities.[9]

The next morning we walked from our guesthouse into the city's historic centre, where we found the Metropolitan Cathedral and the tomb of Archbishop Oscar Romero. An outspoken critic of social injustice, and the US-supported military government during the civil war, he was assassinated in 1980. UN investigations later pinned his death on a pro-government 'death squad'.[10] Dozens of people were also killed at his funeral, at this church, after gunmen fired on mourners and a stampede ensued.[11] Romero had amassed a vast and dedicated following by the time of his death, in part because of his popular Sunday sermons, broadcasted on the church's radio station. He used them to also share details of recent disappearances, cases of torture and murders. They became a main source of news for people about what was happening.

We thought about this by Romero's tomb – and how contemporary activists were, in a similar way, doing the risky work of regularly monitoring and reporting on mining activities. In the area around the contested gold mine that we had come to learn about, a local station Radio Victoria had been covering its plans – and resistance to them – for years. Staffers said they had received anonymous threats 'that we were on death lists' by phone as well as via 'letters slipped under the door of the radio station and at our homes'.[12]

We wanted to meet some of these people who were following and challenging mining companies' activities in the country. This is why the first meeting we arranged was with Pedro Cabezas, coordinator of the International Allies against Mining network, at a small restaurant in the capital, not far from our guest house. Pedro seemed relaxed, leaning back casually on his chair, sipping a beer, wearing sunglasses in the shade. But what he told us was dramatic: stories of local activists that had been killed or injured in attacks, and others that had been threatened and harassed.

He also described an under-reported story of a historic people's movement to keep the country's gold in the ground and protect its water supplies. It was a hopeful story that contrasted sharply with what El Salvador was better known for.

Internationally, Central America's smallest country usually made headlines for violence and organized crime. Reports covered things like: how the country had one of the world's highest homicide rates[13]; estimates suggesting that 10 per cent of the population were involved with gangs including the notorious MS-13 with their memorable face tattoos[14]; and how violence was driving many others to undertake sometimes treacherous journeys to flee to other countries, including the US.[15]

It could seem like an unlikely candidate for a country to pioneer world-leading environmental measures. But Pedro shared data from public opinion polls commissioned by a Salvadoran university, suggesting a majority of the population opposed mining. He named politicians from rival parties, Catholic Church leaders and large NGOs that rarely agree but had all come out against mining too.

'Some days, I feel like it could actually happen,' Pedro grinned. 'We might actually become the first country in the world to ban mining, once and for all.'

He didn't think that this would happen quickly – even with the president on side. He feared that it could be delayed for years because of the case before the World Bank tribunal in Washington DC. Though he was undeterred. 'We'll continue to fight'.

Dreams delayed

Even with the president on side, it's not enough. What Pedro said stuck with us. It was hard to imagine a more influential person in a country, or a more useful ally.

But 'that's the kind of power we're up against', he had told us, suggesting that the international legal system the mining company had access to gave it a kind of supreme strength that could bring even steadfast governments to their knees.

We arrived in El Salvador just months after the then newly-elected FMLN President Salvador Sánchez Cerén took office in mid-2014. The former teacher and left-wing guerrilla commander seemed to have made his own position against mining clear. 'Everyone says that El Salvador has underground wealth – golden valleys and basins of silver', Cerén told the Salvadoran daily La Prensa Gráfica. But extracting it, he said: 'will destroy our lives'.[16]

He spoke softly and promoted the concept of 'buen vivir' (Spanish for 'living well') – which had been sweeping across Latin America since the mid-2000s.[17] It was an alternative paradigm for evaluating progress that centred people and communities, and their relationship with nature.[18] This was important: If his administration would oppose mining, they also said they wanted to build something new.

This was why we were excited to have secured interviews with officials in Cerén's government including Ángel Ibarra, vice-minister for the environment. Until that year, he'd been president of the Salvadoran Ecological Unit (UNES) environmental group. A trained physician, and former dean of the country's Lutheran University, he'd also joined the FMLN during the civil war, though he left the party after the conflict ended.

'Until a few days ago I was not considering joining public service. This was not in my plans', Ibarra had said, shortly after the elections that brought Cerén's government to power. He agreed to join it because of the president-elect's embrace of the 'paradigm of buen vivir' and commitments to address the country's environmental crisis.[19]

In his new role, Ibarra pledged to work with social movements to build a new 'environmental sustainability agenda'. He also promised to embrace humility, and avoid 'pageantry', saying: 'I will continue working and living in the same way I have until today. I will not change the way I dress, I will not wear a jacket and tie.'[20]

We met at the environment ministry. Ibarra's office looked freshly painted, and tidy, but was sparsely decorated. As if he'd just moved in, and didn't know what to do with the space. As promised, he wasn't wearing a suit and tie, but a short-sleeved shirt with no collar. Like Pedro he seemed relaxed, but when we sat down, seriousness took over.

'We are the country with the worst water stress in Latin America', Ibarra emphasized. But his eyes lit up describing the prospect of a new law, for which he was advocating, to prioritise water for human over industrial consumption. This was deeply connected to the anti-mining fight: mines use a lot of water.

'New laws like this', the vice minister told us, 'are needed to make sure that everyone has access to water', no matter how much money or power they have. This, he added, can also help 'resolve conflicts' before they start.

Other government officials and advisors that we met similarly exuded hope, as well as concern. Several told us they thought that other companies were likely watching the case filed by Pacific Rim, and that they were potentially considering similar multi-million dollar challenges of their own. They described uphill battles and potentially devastating risks in their quest to work more closely with local communities and chart a more sustainable course for the country's development.

At a café in the capital, Luis Lopez, an environmental advisor to the newly elected FMLN party, told us that mining companies were pressuring the country on multiple levels, 'in the community, the local government, and via this international system'. Like Ibarra, he didn't look like a typical political operative. His long curly hair was in a ponytail, he was unshaven and his shirt was creased, its sleeves rolled up to his elbows.

Lopez was also an advocate of buen vivir, and what its positive and holistic vision of the future could offer the country. 'What are we supposed to do?' he asked rhetorically. 'Give in?' He shook his head. It was not a good option.

'There's a threat of more suits', he said. 'But put in this context – is the bigger threat that the people of your country die, or you get sued in Washington?'

Previously, at the national ombudsman for human rights, a publicly funded office set up after the civil war, we had found Yanira Cortez. She had also been following conflicts around mining and was similarly concerned about the industry's environmental impacts.

On her desk were tall stacks of paper. She seemed overwhelmed. She doubted her country's institutions were up to the task of regulating mining companies. 'And even if we did, if we finish up our water resources, it's not a good deal,' she said.

El Salvador, Cortez stressed, had a severe water crisis. It was under extreme environmental stress; highly susceptible to floods and natural disasters; and one of the most deforested countries in Latin America, with more than 90 per cent of its surface water already contaminated.[21] She also pointed us to the San Sebastián river, east of the capital, which was often pictured on anti-mining banners because of severe water contamination allegedly left behind by a previous gold mine. That area's experience, she explained, was crucial context for the contemporary anti-mining struggle. Mining's environmental consequences weren't merely hypothetical – there was proof.

Gold mining often uses toxic substances such as cyanide or mercury to extract the metal. The Salvadoran movement to keep these riches in the ground grew amid concern over the risks mining posed to these already-stressed, essential resources – as well as scepticism that normal people would benefit from digging them up.

We wanted to see San Sebastian for ourselves – and got lucky. International activists that Meera had connected us to, who were in the country at the same time, were headed in that direction to look at the old mine. We had to wake up at the break of dawn to get a ride with them, meeting in a parking lot just as the sun came up. We piled into a small bus where we would have slept if we hadn't been in such interesting company.

Everyone else seemed to be wide-awake, and eager to talk to us. We were the only journalists on the bus, and they wanted to know why we were there. We explained that we were learning about the struggle to ban mining and whether it was being threatened by a legal case going through a little-known but seemingly very powerful global legal system.

'So you mean ICSID, and the suit Pacific Rim filed?' one of our travel companions responded, to which others nodded. We then realised that everyone we had spoken to thus far in El Salvador – from a worker at our guest house to taxi drivers to our interviewees had known about the legal case but also the obscure World Bank branch overseeing it: the International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes. They described it as a sort of supreme court, far away, determining their futures.

As we drove east, slowly on poorly paved roads, we also learned more about these people. Among them were campaigners from other Latin American countries fighting their own battles with expanding extractive industries. They had come to support the local anti-mining movement, and to learn from it. One American man told us he had come to El Salvador many times over the years – including during the civil war and the time of the 'Sanctuary movement' in which some US religious congregations took direct action to support refugees fleeing violence.

That movement was subjected to a US government crackdown including a long-running investigation with paid informants and undercover agents. In the mid-1980s, a series of high-profile criminal prosecutions targeted sanctuary activists in Texas and Arizona and charged them with facilitating illegal migration.[22]

Salvadoran activists then told us more about the San Sebastian mine. It had been operated by a Wisconsin-based company called Commerce Gold, until 2006 when the government revoked its environmental permits and didn't renew its exploration licenses. Foreshadowing the case launched by the Canadian mining company that brought us to El Salvador, Commerce Gold didn't leave without a fight. In 2009 it also filed a suit against the country at the same World Bank branch that Pacific Rim would later go to, demanding at least $100 million in compensation for not being allowed to continue mining.[23]

Evidence had been mounting that mining had devastated the environment and health of local communities. But, we'd learn, this wouldn't have been relevant for the tribunal which had a narrow mandate: to consider if El Salvador had violated the company's 'rights' as a foreign investor. That case didn't go the company's way – it was dismissed by the tribunal which said it didn't have jurisdiction over it.[24] It left the country – but we soon saw some of what it left behind.

Off the bus, we walked along the river. We saw abandoned tools and barrels that local activists said were believed to be contaminated with toxic waste. They described enduring concerns about the impacts of chemicals from the mine on the river, which a 2012 government study had shown contained nine times the acceptable level of cyanide and 1,000 times the acceptable level of iron.[25] We stopped on a bridge across the water and saw women and children washing clothes and bathing in its murky waves.

Independence day

The contested mining project that Pacific Rim had run, in El Salvador's central Cabañas region, seemed to have been fittingly named 'El Dorado'. It was also the name of the mythical city of gold which had drawn legions of explorers and colonists to Latin America. Local activists described mining companies as new imperialists, and said that this project threatened the whole country's independence.

On 15 September, as Meera had suggested, we arrived in the area near El Dorado. It was the date of the hearing on the legal case's 'merits' at the World Bank – and the day on which, every year, many Central American countries celebrate their independence from Spain in 1821, after almost three centuries of colonial rule. This was no coincidence: El Salvador's lawyers had suggested this date for its symbolism. The company's case, they agreed with activists, threatened the country's sovereignty.

Driving north from the capital, we had seen from our car's windows many typical independence ceremonies – with local marching bands and children twirling batons in village street parades. At our destination, a temporary stage had been erected in the middle of a square. Children were playing. But the banners that had been strung up demanded that the company 'get out' of the area and that El Salvador ban mining once and for all. Between musical acts, speakers on stage echoed these messages.

It was a celebration – but of resistance, rather than independence. And it seemed to have attracted everyone who lived in the local area. We took seats amid hundreds of other people under a blue tarpaulin tent, and then took a walk around the square.

In a small park nearby, we met a 24-year-old local farmer named Jose Bolmorin, who described his concerns about mining activities. 'They only say the great things it will bring; development, jobs for the people, but it doesn't happen like that, even if it did make money, it's not more important than health', he insisted, asking us: what are promised 'economic benefits' worth, in the end, 'if you're sick all the time?'

'We still have to fight for our independence', added Hector Berrios, a local activist who we also met that day. His black t-shirt was emblazoned in yellow with the anti-mining movement's simple but powerful slogan: 'No to mining, Yes to life'.

Berrios told us that he wanted mining companies to listen to the festival's message, and leave the area. He described violence against those who opposed mining, and how it had affected him personally. 'Even during the war I wasn't so afraid of being killed', he said, about death threats against himself and his wife. Once, he added, they had been drugged by armed men who ransacked their home and stole files related to their activism.

Behind him was a mural of Marcelo Rivera, a fellow local activist who had disappeared on 18 June 2009 – three days after Pacific Rim filed its international suit against El Salvador. His naked body was found weeks later, in a well, bearing signs of torture: he'd been beaten, his fingernails removed, his trachea broken.[26]

Rivera's name came up frequently in our interviews – because of the gruesome nature of his death, but also because there seemed to be little faith that officials had fully investigated it and whether he was murdered for his anti-mining activism.

Yanira Cortez, from the state's human rights office, told us it was clear that 'the start of mining and the beginning of tensions have an intimate relationship'.

Her office had also issued a statement warning that authorities had 'not taken all possible actions nor exhausted all lines of inquiry to clarify who the intellectual and material perpetrators of these crimes are'. It warned of ongoing threats, and a 'lack of protective measures and comprehensive reparations for affected families'.[27]

The international legal case over the El Dorado mine would drag on until late 2016. In the end, the World Bank tribunal sided with El Salvador, and the company (then OceanaGold) was ordered to pay $8 million to cover some – but not all – of the country's legal costs.[28] Though this was not the end of the story – and activists seemed to see it as a relief, rather than a victory.

El Salvador's defence had cost $12 million – and so it was still out of pocket by $4 million. The company took another year to pay the government what it was ordered to, and until 2019 – a decade after the case began – to complete sales of its property, dissolve its assets, and concede that it did not plan future investments in the country.[29]

A huge amount of time and energy had been spent on this case, which could have been spent supporting communities and protecting the environment. But, while delayed, Pedro's dream of a mining ban did finally become a reality. In March 2017, Salvadoran lawmakers voted overwhelmingly to prohibit all mining for gold and other metals, making the country the first in the world to impose such a nationwide ban.[30]

This was our introduction to what's called the international investor-state dispute settlement (ISDS) system that corporations have used to challenge government actions across the world. On the ground in El Salvador, we learned how this system seemed to be squeezing the country and making it harder, or more costly, for it to protect its environment and its people.

Next, we'd go to Washington DC and into historical archives to learn how this system expanded around the world – and how contemporary concerns about its impact on independence and democracy had been eerily forewarned.

Chapter 2
Corporate courts

Out of control

On our way back to London, we made a 48-hour stop in Washington DC – where the mining company's case against El Salvador had been filed at the World Bank's little-known International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID).

After sleeping restlessly on friends' sofas, we met the next morning on K Street. So infamous for housing corporate and political lobbyists, its name had become synonymous with influence peddling. Its clients included giant companies and authoritarian regimes spending millions a year to whitewash their reputations.[1]

Pacific Rim, the mining company that had filed the case we were looking at, had also hired professional influencers from this neighbourhood. US lobbying disclosures showed that the corporate law firm Crowell & Moring spent at least $300,000 between 2009 and 2014 lobbying the US government on behalf of the company and for the 'development of the El Dorado mine', including meetings with the White House.[2] A second firm, Otto Reich Associates, had also met with representatives of Congress and the State Department on its behalf, about an 'investment dispute impacting foreign relations'.[3] It had been set up by a former US ambassador to Venezuela who also served in George W. Bush's government.[4]

But we had come to this street to visit the office of Luis Parada – El Salvador's lawyer, defending it against the mining company. He was the first of many lawyers we would meet who have specialised in the international investor-state legal system.

In a large lobby we were directed to elevators. As we moved up towards Parada's floor we took out our notebooks and opened them to our prepared questions. The lawyer, we assumed, would be very busy. His CV featured impressive degrees – West Point military academy, Georgetown law. He had spent more than a decade at top law firms, and was now one of a small group of lawyers in the world who specialize in investor-state cases. His time was surely expensive, and we didn't expect much of it.

We wanted him to explain to us the inner-workings of the case El Salvador faced, and what had happened during the hearing on its independence day. We also wanted his views, as an inside source, on how this investor-state legal system could have grown so globally powerful with so little scrutiny.

When the doors to the elevator opened on his floor, we were suprised to find Parada immediately in front of us, apparently eagerly waiting for us. We followed him down a corridor to a glass-walled meeting room where we sat down and he started our meeting with questions of his own. He wanted to hear about our trip: what people were saying on the ground, and what the 'Festival of Resistance' near the mine site had been like.

We told him what we'd learned then, but also in the capital, and in the area near the San Sebastian river, polluted from previous mining activities. In interviews with local farmers, community activists, environmentalists, Franciscan monks and national politicians, there had been a key theme: that the company's case threatened El Salvador's very independence and ability to decide its own future. Beyond the vast sums of money that were at stake, people told us they were worried that it could delay the passage of laws to ban mining and address the country's clean water crisis.

Then it was our turn. Why was this case taking so long to resolve? Was it an exaggeration to say it threatened the country's sovereignty? And was it unique?

The lawyer leaned forward in his chair. 'This system is out of control', he told us firmly. Using his hands, he charted in the air a massive explosion in such cases since the 1990s. While this legal system had been set up decades earlier, he said it had taken time to take hold and grow. He gave us several reasons for this, including a boom in the number of investment treaties, laws and contracts that give multinational companies and investors access to its tribunals.

He knew this history well, having joined the legal industry around these cases in the 1990s himself. His first such case was on the defence team for Argentina's government after it was sued in 1997 by the French utilities conglomerate Vivendi.[5] What prompted that dispute? Amid a popular uprising against water privatisation, the Tucuman provincial government, Parada explained, had stepped in to limit the price residents were charged for water and wastewater services. The company objected. It lost that case, but resubmitted its claim and emerged with a $105 million award the second time.[6]

Since then, there had been no shortage of work. Though unlike many other lawyers in the industry who represent both companies and states, he'd picked one side: defending states. And as this field grew, so did his discomfort with it. The mining company's case against El Salvador should never have happened, he argued. It was, he said, essentially about 'whether a foreign investor can force a government to change its laws … as opposed to the foreign investor complying with the [country's] laws'.

He repeated the Salvadoran defence that we had read in its legal filings: the company lacked necessary permits required to mine and didn't even have proof that it held all of the land it needed. Even without national opposition to mining, it couldn't go ahead without fulfilling these legal requirements, and it shouldn't be able to get an exemption from them by going above local courts to Washington DC.

Parada explained that proponents of this system, and international treaties that enshrine it, argue that it can boost foreign investment into developing countries by giving investors assurances that they'll be treated fairly. He said that he thought this system 'was created with good intentions, but in practice it has gone completely rogue, and nothing can bring it under control'.

'I personally don't think countries get as much from these treaties as the risks that they incur', he told us. 'Let's put it this way, if I were the President of a country, I wouldn't be happy with my country being a party to this system.'

But getting out of this system isn't easy once you join it. The treaties that enshrine it, Parada continued, often have 'sunset clauses' – meaning their provisions stay in force for years, even decades, if the treaties are cancelled. Withdrawing from them could even trigger cases if investors rush to use them before they expire.

He paused to let this sink in. It made us think again of what had surprised us in El Salvador: even presidents and parliaments can't really stop this?

To dismantle this system, Parada concluded, it would take 'a broad consensus of determined states'. It would be hard for any one country to do it alone.

We found it striking that this elite lawyer, who made his own money off of such cases, albeit on the defence side, seemed so strident in his belief that his industry shouldn't actually exist at all. If it were ever dismantled, as he argued should happen, wouldn't he be out of a job? We had expected him to vigorously argue El Salvador's case, but not to question the validity of the whole system.

'I have not seen a critical mass of states with the political will [to tackle it] much less a broad consensus,' he said with regret. 'But I still hope it happens.'

Into the archives

Back on K street, we turned a corner and within about ten minutes found the World Bank's main campus in Washington DC – a large complex of buildings spanning several city blocks. Somewhere inside them was ICSID, the little-known branch where the mining company was challenging El Salvador.

ICSID's website called it the 'world's leading institution devoted to international investment dispute settlement', saying it had 'administered the majority' of these cases globally. It also said it 'contributes to the [World Bank's] overall goal of poverty reduction' by promoting foreign investment via 'providing confidence in the dispute resolution process', not unlike Parada's description of proponents' claims.[7]

We wanted to see for ourselves the place where El Salvador was being threatened with a multi-million dollar legal claim for not allowing that mining company to dig for gold. We also wanted to know more about the ICSID branch itself. We wanted to explore the institution's archives and see for ourselves the 'good intentions' that Parada said he thought had existed at the start, before the system went 'rogue'.

We needed visitor passes to get into the World Bank, which we had begun to arrange weeks in advance of our trip – as well as an appointment to enter its archives. Some historical files, letters and photographs could only be found there, in person.

An archive staffer was expecting us. She watched us as we left all of our belongings in a locker outside of a reading room where she led us to a table. She gave us pencils and paper to make notes; gloves would have to be worn to touch photographs; we'd have to sign in and out even to go to the toilet.

The reading room would close at 4pm, sharp. We had limited time to find what we were looking for. We skipped lunch and spent it huddled over documents instead.

We could request one cardboard box of historical records at a time. They were each labelled with numerous codes. We were given cards to track when and where we removed files from a box, to replace them in exactly the same position.

Everything seemed impressively and logically organized. But we still struggled to find the transcripts and initial proposals on setting up the ICSID branch. There must have been meetings about it. Who had championed it? Who were they talking to? Did anyone disagree? And, crucially, where were the notes?

We requested boxes of records from the offices of the first presidents of the World Bank. We found copies of letters from these men thanking people for gifts, or to staff arranging for the shipment of their belongings from continent to continent, between international postings and conferences. But, box after box, we came up short.

The staffer seemed to sense our frustration, and came up to our table. 'If you tell me a bit more about what you're looking for, maybe I can help,' she offered.

We explained. She responded with an uncomfortable, puzzled look. She couldn't remember a previous request for ICSID's files. She wasn't sure where they were. Finally she suggested that perhaps ICSID had its own archive, in its office. We could try there?

We asked her for directions to the ICSID office, and were surprised that she looked puzzled again. 'I assumed you knew where it was.'

But she checked her computer, dialled a phone number and got us some answers. Some of the files we wanted did exist, and had even been reprinted in a multi-volume set of books which we could find at ICSID. We got an address too.

Thanking her for help, we left the reading room and collected our things from the lockers outside. A clock on the wall said it was already well into the afternoon. But at least she had saved us from spending the whole day in the wrong place.

ICSID's offices were in the Bank's J building – across the street from its main building on Pennsylvania Avenue, where we'd been at the archive. We'd imagined that once we were in the right building it would be enough to ask people there for specific directions. But those we stopped in the lobby and corridors also gave us puzzled looks.

Some of them didn't even seem to recognise the name ICSID, asking us to repeat it. But when we finally found this branch's offices, we saw that it occupied an entire wing of a floor. It wasn't well known, but it certainly didn't look small.

We went through a glass door and found the person that had answered the archive staffer's phone call. She was friendly and took us on an impromptu tour of the office, showing off its file rooms, meeting rooms and desks for what she said was the centre's rapidly growing team. 'Our office wasn't always this big,' she emphasized.

It made sense that it had grown as ICSID statistics showed the same boom in cases that Parada had sketched out with his hands in the air in his office. By mid-2014, almost 500 cases had been registered, almost all since the late 1990s.[8] (By late 2021, that total would rise to almost 900, with the equivalent of more than one a week that year.)[9]

Latin America was the most-challenged region with about a third of all cases, but countries around the world had ended up in the dock here. Pie charts in caseload reports also showed slices for Africa, Asia, Europe and North America.[10]

Most of these cases were filed under similarly little-known 'bilateral investment treaties' (another of a growing list of acronyms we had to learn: BITs) signed between countries. Mining, oil and gas companies and investors had filed the largest number of cases, but there had also been claims by those in agriculture, transportation and other industries.

Once we'd circled the office back to her desk we asked where we could find the books we'd been told about, compiling historical files from ICSID's foundation. She nodded and disappeared into a storage room, returning with a cardboard box. It looked heavy. She lifted the lid slightly to show us that inside was a stack of thick books with dark blue covers. 'We have extra copies,' she said. 'You could buy them from us.'

We'd come to the World Bank complex to find these documents, but we hadn't expected to be able to take copies home where we could study them more thoroughly. We took out our wallets, but she waved them away. We had to get a money order, which she suggested we could find at a shop down the street. If we could return within the hour, the books would be ours. Another hurdle.

We shot out of the building and found the shop she'd recommended. Back at the Bank, we flashed our visitor badges at security and ran up the stairs, arriving ten minutes before the office was supposed to close. We left feeling triumphant. We hailed a taxi and put our bounty between us. That cardboard box of big, heavy books containing thousands of pages from the early days of this international system. It would be a long trip home, but that meant many hours to dig into this history.

El No de Tokyo

We packed that box of books into a carry-on bag, which came on the plane to London with us. We didn't sleep during our overnight flight. Instead we turned on the lights above our seats and thumbed through as many pages as we could.

Over the ocean, we learned that some poor countries had been sceptical about, and resistant to, the international investor-state legal system from the start. Generations ago, they had warned that it threatened their sovereignty – just as El Salvador was now saying. This seemed to conflict with Parada's idea that it had been set up with good intentions but had gotten 'out of control'.

The papers included 'summary records' from regional meetings ahead of ICSID's establishment, including one in Santiago, Chile where World Bank delegates from twenty Latin American countries gathered in February 1964.[11]

According to that record, Argentina's representative 'found great difficulty in accepting the principle underlying the draft [ICSID] Convention', and 'felt that to detract from national sovereignty was not an acceptable method for improving the investment climate'.[12] Something that meanwhile 'raised doubts' in the mind of Brazil's delegate was that 'foreign investors would be granted a legally privileged position, in violation of the principle of full equality'.[13]

The record from another regional meeting, in Asia a few months later, captured how India's representative warned that the proposals 'gave investors additional rights of unspecified scope' without saying anything about their obligations.[14] He also seemed worried about plans being pushed through without enough debate. The record said 'he hoped that before the final draft of the [ICSID] Convention was adopted by the Bank and recommended to governments it would be considered in a wider forum'.[15] A Thai delegate meanwhile 'stressed that the views which he had expressed were not final and should not be considered as committing the Thai Government in any way'.[16]

Then, a group of twenty-one countries – nineteen from Latin America, plus the Philippines and Iraq – voted against the World Bank's proposals at its 1964 annual meetings in Tokyo that September.[17]

A representative for Chile explained this group's opposition, saying:

> 'The new system would give the foreign investor, by virtue of the fact that he is a foreigner, the right to sue a sovereign state outside its national territory, dispensing with the courts of law. This provision is contrary to the accepted legal principles of our country and, de facto, would confer a privilege on the foreign investor, placing the nationals of the country concerned in a position of inferiority.'[18]

Among insiders, this became known as the 'El No de Tokyo'.[19] But despite such opposition to the proposal, it moved forward regardless. Andreas Lowenfeld, a German-American legal academic who was involved in some of that period's discussions, later said: 'I believe this was the first time that a major resolution of the World Bank had been pressed forward with so much opposition.'[20]

From El Salvador to South Africa – where we would go next – we'd hear a variation of the same thing: that surely the government officials who signed up to the international investor-state legal system didn't know what they were getting into. They couldn't have known that their countries' independence would be at stake, when they ceded power to this system and its treaties and its tribunals.

But it was clear, in black and white on our tray tables: some did know from the start, and make their concerns clear. A bloc of developing countries had opposed it, to defend their sovereignty. The system was set up despite this.

Follow the money

Back in London, we made a spreadsheet of every investor-state case that had been filed at the World Bank centre, which was formally established two years after that Tokyo meeting, in 1966. We studied it for trends across time, regions and industries.

But it was these questions that we kept returning to: could our governments and elected officials actually be in charge of less than we thought? Why hadn't we heard more about this before? Was this international legal system the reason why, for example, even progressive governments weren't taking more aggressive action against climate change, or to protect worker's rights?

That afternoon, we took advantage of running into Gavin in the corridor of the CIJ to tell him about what we had learned and get his advice on our next steps.

We described the striking parallels between what Salvadoran activists told us – about the company's case threatening their independence – and the protests of developing countries at the creation of ICSID half a century earlier. He chuckled at our retelling of how we got the documents that showed this but then looked very serious as we described what they contained.

Along with the interviews we'd done in El Salvador, which Gavin said showed why all of this mattered, he was impressed with the historical files we'd brought back, and our meeting with Parada. This wasn't surprising: he loved inside sources.

He also made us think about what was, and was not, being said. He made us realise that the case against El Salvador was indeed unique in an important way: the amount of public attention it had received in the country. Unlike the workers at the World Bank who looked puzzled when we mentioned their ICSID branch, everyone we had talked to in the Central American country knew of it (by its Spanish acronym 'CIADI').

But what about the cases which governments don't publicly fight, like El Salvador's seemed determined to do? How many of these disputes are resolved behind closed doors, without citizens and taxpayers ever knowing about them?

We left Gavin's office with three ideas: first, we would try not to lose sight, no matter how far we dug into details, of our instinctual questions about how this system affects and may even overrule democracies; second, we would next look into cases in which there was even less publicly available information – in which the governments involved didn't publicly disclose disputes and defend themselves; third, we would 'follow the money' because it could help us better understand who the key players are.

To do all of this, Gavin suggested, we should stay in touch with Parada and try to spend more time with as many inside sources – people and documents – as we could. In our windowless room again, we studied the websites and publications of law firms specialising in these cases; their press releases, newsletters, briefings, and promotional materials for their current and prospective clients.

With such big amounts of money involved in these disputes – for all of the bills, let alone potential awards – we learned that challenging governments at international tribunals through the investor-state dispute system had become a very big business. A huge industry had grown around this legal field, complete with a slick conference circuit, trade publications and industry awards. There were also elite consultants who specialised in helping foreign investors and multinational companies to structure their businesses overseas in order to gain access to this system through the 'best' treaties for them.

At the law firm King & Wood Mallesons in London, Andrei Yakovlev told us: 'It's no longer black magic. Now pretty much every firm, every even medium sized firm in this city, would say, yes, we can do investment arbitrations.'

These cases were generally overseen by tribunals of three professional 'arbitrators'. Online, we found the transcript of a talk by John Ruggie, a former UN Special Representative for Business and Human Rights, warning that these people are usually 'contract lawyers who don't give a damn about human rights obligations'.[21]

We also studied the records of hundreds of ICSID cases to take a closer look at who these people are. Most were European or North American men. They included former government officials, as well as former (or current) corporate advisors and lawyers. Examples included a Canadian former UN ambassador who also previously sat on corporate boards including that of mining giant Rio Tinto[22]; the senior White House official responsible for international trade and investment in President George W. Bush's administration[23]; and a former lawyer to the Mexican government during negotiations over the North American Free Trade Treaty (NAFTA) treaty that gave rise to many new cases.[24]

Something else that El Salvador's lawyer said had stuck with us: investor-state claims were increasingly seen as an 'asset class' in themselves. There were now specialized financiers that invested in them, taking cuts of any eventual awards.

Parada thought this had something to do with the rise in cases, telling us: 'I think it is fueling a lot of arbitrations that wouldn't have even started.'

There didn't seem to be anything like legal aid for states to defend themselves in these disputes. But it seemed like some companies could mount cases without having to foot the bill – and challenging states had become a business in itself for law firms but also so-called 'third-party funders'. It had become a way for people unconnected with the disputes at hand to get rich or richer.

Burford Capital, a leading third-party funder, claimed 'a particular specialty in investment treaty arbitration'. Echoing Parada's speculation, it said it could make the difference between cases 'being heard and needing to be abandoned'.[25] It had an office in Croydon, south of London, as well as one in Manhattan.

Among Burford's investments was its support for a British power investor called Rurelec. It had filed its case against Bolivia at the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague, rather than at ICSID (which handles most but not all of these disputes). It demanded around $150 million in compensation after the country nationalized Empresa Electrica Guaracachi, its largest energy provider, in 2010.[26] Rurelec had held a majority stake in this company – but just barely, with 50.001 per cent of its shares, and only indirectly, through a US subsidiary under a holding company registered in the British Virgin Islands. This structure let it file for damages under investment treaties Bolivia had signed with both the US and the UK. In 2014, a tribunal ordered the country to pay it $29 million.[27]

Burford put out a triumphant press release about the case and its role. It announced a net profit of $11 million from the dispute. It also said it was an example of how, more than 'simply helping to pay legal fees', third-party finance can 'help companies achieve their strategic goals'.[28]

'Rurelec did not need capital to pay its lawyers. Rather, it needed capital to continue to grow', Burford explained. It gave the company a $15 million loan to further expand its business during the dispute – using its claim against Bolivia as an asset to secure it. This enabled the company to 'monetize the value' of its case.

Another financier at a London-based outfit also told us he believed 'without funding, a good chunk of these treaty cases wouldn't have happened'.

It seemed like a notable pattern: Many of the financiers and law firms involved in these cases had offices in London – home for both of us at the time – though they seemed to belong to a parallel world, outside of scrutiny. But our time in El Salvador had taught us that their obscure and jargon-rich dealings had very real consequences.

Chapter 3
Secret insurance

Foresti vs South Africa

Some law firms seemed explicit in their communications that gaining 'leverage' was something a company could get out of a case filed through this system.

In a briefing paper for their clients, the US firm K&L Gates suggested that they could use the threat of such a case as a 'bargaining tool' in negotiating with governments.[1] Another UK firm, Clyde & Co, said they could use the 'potential adverse publicity' of a case as 'leverage in the event of a dispute' with a state.[2]

It sounded like what we'd seen in El Salvador. That case ultimately seemed to be about challenging government policy and requirements to start mining. Though because it wouldn't be resolved for years, we decided to turn next to an already concluded dispute. We filtered our database of ICSID cases for those marked 'concluded'. One caught our eye: Foresti vs South Africa, which had been launched by investors in the mining industry in South Africa in 2006.

It had lasted a comparatively short three-and-a-half years. It ended in 2010, with the investors' claims 'dismissed with prejudice' by the tribunal.[3] It seemed, in this case, that the country had emerged victorious. We wanted to know more about what was at stake and what went into this result, from those who'd know best, on the ground.

A month later, we boarded a flight for Johannesburg, South Africa's mining capital. On the plane, we reviewed files we'd found for the case, which cited investment treaties signed with Italy (in 1997) and Luxembourg and Belgium (in 1998), not long after the end of its apartheid regime. That period had been one of vast and well-documented change. Nelson Mandela, out of prison, had been elected president in 1994. A new constitution was then introduced in 1996 – often described as one of the world's most progressive, among other things because it outlaws discrimination based on characteristics like race and gender.[4]

The ICSID record for this case listed numerous claimants – members of the Foresti and Conti Italian families of industrialists from the Carrara region, as well as a company, Finstone, incorporated in Luxembourg.

We could not find significant international media coverage of this case either, which surprised us the more we learned about it. The dispute was not disconnected from era-defining events. South Africa had been challenged over post-apartheid policies to redress racial injustices.

A few years before these investors filed their case at the World Bank's ICSID branch, South Africa's new post-apartheid Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act came into force. Along with a new mining charter, this law sought to redress inequalities and required companies to partner with citizens who had suffered under apartheid.

It effectively terminated all previously held mining rights, and required that companies reapply to continue operations, instituting a mandatory 26 per cent ownership stake in mining companies for black South Africans.[5] This was what the Italian industrialists decided to challenge internationally.

It was hard to believe that wealthy European investors could have contested this post-apartheid policy at an international tribunal without their case being internationally covered by the media – and condemned by the public. But there seemed to have been barely a murmur in the global press as they used the investor-state dispute system to claim that new Black Economic Empowerment policies were 'unfair' and had effectively 'expropriated' their investments. They demanded more than $350 million in compensation.[6]

For their part, South African officials, it seemed, had tried to keep a lid on the case – they hadn't forcefully condemned it publicly, as a threat to their sovereignty, as the government had in El Salvador. Some local civil society groups had found out about the dispute anyway, and had petitioned the international tribunal to let them participate in the case. They were eventually allowed to submit a written briefing, but not to attend the hearings.

A densely worded document on ICSID's website said the investors had requested a discontinuance of the case, and that they were ordered to pay part of South Africa's legal costs.[7] A government press release from that time celebrated this result as a 'successful conclusion'.[8] But the details didn't seem to add up.

The investors were only ordered to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars towards the country's costs – leaving it with millions in legal fees that still had to be paid with public funds. Shortly after this dispute ended, South Africa started to review the international treaties that gave investors access to this legal system, and began cancelling them.[9]

It actually seemed to be one of the few countries actively trying to get out of the game – as Parada, El Salvador's lawyer, had recommended while explaining how challenging this is to do. Why was South Africa embarking on this difficult task, if the result of that case had been a 'success'?

Marikana tombstones

We landed in Johannesburg after overnight flights with a several-hour stop and connection in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. We had booked rooms at a small guest house in Melville, which our research had told us was a 'bohemian suburb' of Johannesburg west of its central business district, with many popular restaurants and bars.

We had a full itinerary of interviews booked for our time in the city – including with a South African government advisor, lawyers for the Italian investors, and some of the human rights groups which had tried to intervene in that case.

But we also wanted to see some of the investments at the centre of the dispute. And unfortunately we didn't know exactly where to find them or how we would get there.

We had found descriptions and some vague addresses for some of the quarries and factories in the Italian investors' empire: 'a 20km long outcrop running from north of Marikana to north of Rustenburg' (but how could we find this?), or 'Main Street, Marikana' (with no number). We considered hiring a car and driving to the area – maybe there would be signs to follow, or people to ask for directions?

If nothing else, we thought, travelling to the Marikana mining district would give us a sense of the place where many of the investors' operations were located. It was also well-known internationally and seemed to epitomize injustices in the South Africa mining industry, one of the world's largest. It felt important to see it in person.

Outside our guest house, we stopped at a street corner where we saw a taxi, parked in the shade of some trees. We approached it and the driver rolled down his window.

'Do you need a ride?' he smiled.

We explained that we wanted to hire him, but not immediately, and not for a short drive in the city. We wanted to leave Johannesburg, and go north. We wanted to hire him and his car for a full day.

He hesitated but then began negotiating. We accepted his price and terms and walked back to our guest house happy. We'd solved our most urgent logistical problem. We'd just have to wake up the next morning very early, before the sun rose.

It was still dark as we drove out of the city, and the driver reminded us of his terms: we'd have to be back in Johannesburg before the sun set, as he had important plans that evening. Outside the city he turned on the car radio and kept it on until we saw a sign for Marikana.

When we arrived in the mining district, we saw how vast it was: a sprawling stretch of territory occupied by numerous gold, silver and other mining operations.

Though it was less than 150 kilometers from Johannesburg, it felt very different, and isolated. It was arid, and the land around the road we were on was largely flat.

Out of our windows, we started to see signs marking the properties of multinational mining giants. The world's largest platinum company Anglo-American's 15 mile-wide mine whizzed by on the left. Then signs for Glencore Xstrata, the tenth largest company in the world, and its vast coal mine. Soon, the site of the infamous 2012 massacre of striking workers at the Lonmin mine came into view.[10]

The roads themselves seemed empty apart from the occasional oversized SUV turning into mine sites surrounded by fences and large gates. Corrugated iron shacks peppered the route into town. People took shade under dog-eared tarpaulin, selling cans of Coca-Cola and Fanta from small stands and informal shops. We saw numerous fried chicken shops, moneylenders and expansive slums.

The town of Marikana itself had the kind of bustle you might expect from a pop-up mining town in the middle of a desert. Colonel Sanders beamed down from the side of a KFC bucket outside one of that chain's restaurants and there seemed to be a surfeit of shopping centres. We took out our notebooks with the vague directions, partial addresses and names we had written down of what we were looking for: some of the properties in the empire of the Italian investors that had challenged South Africa at the World Bank centre in Washington DC.

After about an hour, we had driven through part of this district as well as the entire town. We stopped several times to ask people on the side of the road if they could direct us to the granite sites. So far, this hadn't worked. We decided to return to Main Street, because it was supposed to be home to at least one of the sites we were looking for. We would stop at every building, if needed? We still had time before our driver's deadline to leave the area.

Finally, we spotted something: a small, simple white sign with 'Minaco' written on it, pointing down a side street. It was the name of a granite processing subsidiary of the Finstone Group that had also been named in the case. Its website said that it was 'the largest manufacturer of thick granite slabs in Southern Africa', supplying local and export markets with 'cut-to-size monumental components'.[11] It showed off pictures of banks across Africa and Mormon churches in the US constructed with its materials, which it said was also used for tombstones.[12]

We directed our driver to follow the side street down to the end of a cul-de-sac where we found a factory. He waited for us in the car, listening to the radio, as we stepped out and walked through imposing wire fences to the building.

It was a Saturday afternoon and the factory was still open but its bosses were away and we found a small group of workers, taking a cigarette break in the middle of their 10-hour shifts, who were surprisingly candid about their conditions.

One of these workers introduced himself as 23-year-old Mpho Masisi. He was quick to tell us that the work at the factory was hard, their bosses were harsh, and 'in terms of money, we are not getting anything. We are still struggling'.

'We are working 10 hour shifts and get 140 Rand [$9.65] per day', he elaborated, explaining that Marikana wasn't a cheap place to live and that he and many of his co-workers often worked six days a week in order to make a bit extra. Many people he knew were indebted to local moneylenders like those we'd seen on the drive.

These workers also had to fight hard for the small sums they took home. Masisi told us that their working conditions and pay had gotten so desperate in recent years that they had only just returned to work after a two-month strike. 'I think it's worse than other companies,' he claimed. 'From my experience, it's worse.'

The whole story

The South African government had celebrated the end of the Italian investors' case as a 'success' for the state. But what we found in Marikana didn't look very good for its people. And official records, we were learning, didn't always tell the whole story.

In this instance, the investors seemed able to claim a much more significant victory. While they had requested the dissolution of their ICSID case, they had struck an unprecedented deal with the government – allowing their companies to transfer only 5 per cent of their ownership to Black South Africans, rather than the 26 per cent mandated by the new post-apartheid mining laws.

At that time, one of the investors' lawyers Peter Leon boasted: 'No other mining company in South Africa has been treated so generously since the advent of the [new mining regime].'[13] He also seemed to claim victory – for his clients.

So who really 'won'? This is what we asked ourselves as we waited in the lobby of his firm's office in Sandton, an upscale suburb of Johannesburg. It's also what we asked Jonathan Veeran, Leon's colleague, after he ushered us into a slick meeting room. We skipped introductory questions and went right to the point. How did the investors view the conclusion? Did they get what they wanted?

Veeran nodded vigorously. 'They were most pleased with the result', he said, suggesting that the South African government's press release at the time had been misleading. They had actually settled with the investors outside of the tribunal process – effectively giving them an exemption to the Black Economic Empowerment policies they'd challenged. Why? He thought they were afraid of similar challenges from other companies. 'They wanted it to go away.'

Settling quietly, Veeran explained, seemed like a tactic by the government to try and prevent a flood of other claims. 'If the merits of the case were decided against the government, they thought, "That's it, we are going to go down." And I think that's why they were happy to agree to that settlement.'

We left that meeting somewhat satisfied. What Veeran told us had made sense to us, and it had confirmed our suspicions that the 'success' for South Africa in the government's press release wasn't the whole story.

We could understand why the government might have been afraid of other similar claims. But hiding the case, and potentially misleading people about the result, didn't sound good either. As journalists – in the business of revealing information in the public interest that the powerful want to hide – it was also still troubling that the international media hadn't closely covered this story before.

We took a taxi back to the Melville area where we were staying and went to a small restaurant that was just opening. Over sandwiches and several rounds of coffee, this is what we kept coming back to. The South Africa case was only the second investor-state dispute that we had dug deeply into, after El Salvador. But each seemed to contain very important, untold stories and extremely high stakes.

In Johannesburg, one of the people we'd scheduled to interview was Jason Brickhill, a lawyer at a human rights organization called the Legal Resources Centre (LRC) which had been founded under apartheid in 1979. By the time we visited it had dozens of lawyers on its staff and a clear, proven mission to use the law to secure justice for vulnerable and marginalized people, including the poor, homeless and landless.

The LRC's offices were in a towering, concrete building named after Bram Fischer. He had been a prominent South African lawyer of Afrikaner descent who'd defended anti-apartheid activists – including Nelson Mandela – before being charged with conspiring to overthrow the government and sentenced to life in prison.[14]

We took the elevator to an upper floor and found the organization's base adorned with posters and photos from its past campaigns. We then found Brickhill – hard at work in his room, bent over his desk where books were opened in front of a computer.

We knocked on his door, which was part-open already. 'Jason Brickhill?'

He sat up quickly and made it clear that he knew who we were, and was expecting us. He'd brought two extra chairs into his office in preparation for our meeting; he'd just lost track of time. 'You're looking into the Foresti case,' he began.

The LRC was one of the human rights groups that had petitioned the World Bank's ICSID to submit arguments in the case against South Africa. This was before Brickhill's time, but he was familiar with the dispute.

We told him how the investors' lawyers, had described the conclusion as a victory for their clients, effectively granting them an exemption to Black Economic Empowerment laws. Did he also believe that the government had settled, quietly, because they feared similar claims from other investors?

Brickhill nodded. He also saw the government's decision to agree a deal as 'a pragmatic settlement', he said, 'in the interests of protecting the overall regulatory system – make one exception to keep the whole intact'.

'I can understand that sort of pragmatism,' he continued. But the case was also a 'huge wake-up call' for the South African government, he told us, in terms of understanding the risks of international investment treaties it had signed.

For foreign investors, Brickhill explained, these treaties 'provide much more generous protections potentially than domestic law. So that's why investors and their states would want those arrangements to remain in place'. But from the perspective of the developing countries and the interests of the public and poor communities, these agreements don't look like such good deals. Most worryingly for the human rights lawyer, they don't allow for 'human rights obligations … or for the state to have the space to regulate and redistribute, which is what our constitution requires it to do'.

'I don't think that the international system is completely beyond redemption', he concluded, 'but I do think that it works against development agendas.'

Before travelling to South Africa, we had spoken to academics warning and gathering evidence that one consequence of these treaties was what they called 'regulatory chill' – where governments decide not to pursue, or tone down, certain policies out of fear that they could provoke claims under the investor-state system.[15]

We asked Brickhill whether he'd seen any evidence of this in his country. 'I think it is a factor that informs government decisions,' he replied. 'It's very difficult to quantify, to know what's going on in that space, but certainly one picks it up.'

Brickhill also echoed something else we had heard before: that until the mid-1990s, very few countries had ever been sued through this system. It wasn't as clear then, he suggested, what was at stake when officials signed international investment treaties giving it power. South Africa's post-apartheid government seemed to have signed a series of these treaties, which would leave the country vulnerable to investors' claims, 'more as acts of diplomatic goodwill, than serious legal commitments with potentially far-reaching economic consequences'.

Officials were invited to meetings in Europe, Brickhill told us, 'and there would be all sorts of discussion about South Africa's economic and trade direction, and part of that was an expectation that they would conclude an investment treaty – but they had no real understanding of what they were committing to in law'.

No angels here

Shortly after the Foresti vs South Africa case ended in 2010, the country began to terminate some of the international treaties that it had signed, which gave foreign investors advance permission to take it to tribunals in the investor-state legal system. Critical to the government's calculus was an internal study that asked whether these treaties did in practice help to increase levels of foreign investment and development, as the World Bank, ICSID, and others had promised.[16]

Strikingly, it found no clear evidence to back this up. Meanwhile, it noted that South Africa was receiving significant foreign investment from countries with which it had no such agreements in place (for example, Japan, the US and India).

These were important findings. Brazil, we had also learned, was a rare example of a country that had never signed such treaties.[17] It hadn't seemed to have trouble attracting foreign investment as a result – but the system's supporters said this was an exception, and that no government should base its decisions on exceptions alone. Now, the South African government had further fractured the story.

'There was no pattern between signing treaties and getting investment', Xavier Carim told us by phone from Geneva. He was a former South African government trade official then serving as the country's representative to the World Trade Organization, and he sounded certain. He insisted: 'Companies don't come and invest in a country or not because it does or doesn't have a bilateral investment treaty. They invest if there is a return to be made.'

Carim confirmed that the Italian investors' case had been a wake-up call for the government. 'What was concerning for us,' he said, 'was that you could have an international arbitration – three individuals, making a decision – on what was in effect a legislative programme in South Africa that had been arrived at democratically, and that somehow this arbitration panel could potentially call this into question.'

'It was very, very clear that these treaties are open to such wide interpretations by tribunals, or by investors looking to challenge any government measure, with the possibility of a significant payout at the end of the day,' he continued. 'The simple fact is that these treaties give you very little benefit and they just pose risk.'

While in Johannesburg, we also met Peter Draper – another former official in the government's trade department – in a leafy suburb. Sunlight beamed into his home office through large windows. He sat at his desk, surrounded by books. Retired from government, he was still working as a consultant and seemed to have both historical intelligence and contemporary insight into how debates about this system were evolving.

Like Brickhill, he described a flurry of treaty-signing activity in the 1990s. At that time, he told us, the South African government was 'essentially giving away the store without asking any critical questions, or protecting crucial policy space'. During that period, at the end of apartheid, the state needed room to manoeuvre – to introduce new laws, enforce its new constitution and take action to address injustices. But instead it seemed to lock itself into deals that would limit its ability to do these things.

Draper added another twist, however. 'What we were doing with African countries, when we were negotiating our investment treaties with them, is that we were essentially imposing the same conditions that the Europeans imposed on us,' he said. 'So there was this paradox in our approach … an inconsistency really.'

This suggested that South Africa's government had understood the power of these treaties and the investor-state legal system – if it was imposing it on other, poorer countries where its own investors and companies were operating.

So what was it? Were officials misled into signing these investment treaties, and the Foresti case was a wake-up call? Or did they know what they were getting the country into – because they also pushed the system on others?

One of our last meetings in Johannesburg was with Bonnie Meyersfeld, then director of the Centre for Applied Legal Studies (CALS) at the University of Witwatersrand. This was another of the human rights groups that had unsuccessfully petitioned the World Bank tribunal to let them observe and participate in the Foresti v South Africa proceedings.

This university had previously been the site of numerous protests against apartheid. Like many other institutions in Johannesburg, it also had roots in the mining industry: it had been originally founded as a so-called School of Mines.[18]

We took a taxi across the Nelson Mandela Bridge from the centre of Johannesburg to the university's sprawling West Campus in Braamfontein.

Then we found the offices of CALS, which described itself as a civil society organisation and legal clinic that 'connects the worlds of both academia and social justice'. There, Meyersfeld stressed that the context for everything we were looking into in South Africa was an urgent need to ensure that all of the state's policies supported the ongoing dismantling of apartheid.

'Economic apartheid has thrived since 1994. Black South Africans are poorer, white South Africans are richer, with only a smattering of change in between', she said.

She didn't sound at all like a dry academic. We could hear the outrage in her voice. 'International law, on the one hand, tends not to have jurisdiction over corporate actors, even for human rights violations. At the same time, it provides protection for corporate actors … to profit', she told us.

The international investor-state legal system that we'd been investigating, Meyersfeld continued, only looks 'at one stage of the investment process' – when a state does something an investor doesn't like. She asked: what about before this period, when perhaps 'the investor goes in and exploits a lack of cohesion within a state, and exploits a high level of poverty precisely to make that profit?'

Meyersfeld said she supported the South African government's decision to review and cancel or renegotiate the investment treaties that had been signed. But she thought the government was not necessarily united on the way forward.

> I've seen a lot of arguments and infighting around how much of your fundamental civil and political rights can be compromised for advancing this anti-poverty agenda and it's not clear that there is one position … My fear though is that the government is going to be persuaded by the argument that always wins in the end that we need the capital, we need the income, and that's my concern.

'We're no angel of poverty eradication ourselves and increasingly our banks and our financial institutions are all over the continent, exploiting, and doing exactly the same', Meyersfeld added. 'We're both the recipient of oppressive investment practices and the perpetrator of oppressive investment practices'.

On our flights back to London, we went through what we'd learned. This global legal system seemed to offer foreign investors a sort of secret insurance against any threat to their interests, present or future. If a country can't decide to reverse racist inequalities, can it call itself independent? Can it call itself a democracy?

Chapter 4
Capitalist Magna Carta

San Francisco, 1957

We found another fascinating window into the creation of the international investor-state dispute system in the archives of TIME magazine. In the late 1950s its publisher Henry Luce sponsored what was called the International Industrial Development Conference (IIDC). At the 1957 edition of this event in San Francisco, a German banker called Hermann Abs would make his pitch for such a system almost a decade before the World Bank's ICSID was set up.

TIME magazine dedicated an illustrated, eight-page supplement to conference coverage entitled 'The Capitalist Challenge'. The specifics contained within it helped us to picture the scenes and people who were actually consulted about this system. The articles were written colourfully, with descriptions of attendees as 'an international Who's Who of high finance and high office'.[1]

'From London came financiers whose firms had bankrolled the Industrial Revolution; from Berlin the brisk businessmen who have built Europe's sturdiest economy from the rubble of war', these descriptions continued. The managing director of the Italian car giant Fiat was there. But the biggest delegation by far was a '202-man phalanx of US executives' including those from Ritz Crackers and RCA electronics.[2]

This supplement's articles seemed to describe, and trumpet, this meeting's mission as nothing less than saving the world by expanding capitalism. 'From the first luncheon in the Fairmont's ornate Gold Room, speaker after speaker at the San Francisco conference traced the irresistible upsurge of world population and the revolution of rising expectations that has grown from its hunger for a better life,' they said.[3]

'Westerners emphasized the need to protect investors in new lands seething with nationalism,' reported one article, entitled 'The Valiant Venture'.[4] Another on 'The Anti-Capitalist Attitude' said:

> One of the biggest barriers in the way of foreign investment in the world's underdeveloped countries is not to be found in the tariff regulations or the laws governing the convertibility of currency. It exists instead in the minds and emotions of those who need foreign investment most … because they often tend to equate it with 19th century-style colonialism, they are reluctant to accept it.[5]

These articles also helped us imagine the crowd at this conference, fraternizing after 'intensive, day-long sessions at the Fairmont', at parties, the city opera house, and over cracked crab and California white wine. But 'businessmen never forget that the chief business in business is business', they chirped, and many were on the lookout for new deals. One Asian delegate reportedly said explicitly: 'I am here to woo American miners. I want to convince them of the possibilities of exploitation of my country.'[6]

A celebrity banker

One of the stars of the 1957 conference in San Francisco, according to TIME's record, was Hermann Josef Abs, head of the Deutsche Bank, and director of several giant corporations like Daimler-Benz and Lufthansa.

Jailhouse Rock had just come out and then rising star Elvis Presley was performing downtown. Abs turned 56-years-old while in the Bay Area, he but hadn't travelled there for rock music nor a typical birthday celebration. He had come to give a speech at that elite event – campaigning for what the magazine called a new 'Capitalist Magna Carta' to enshrine and protect 'rights' for private investors worldwide.

We pictured the stocky, mustachioed banker striding into the Fairmont Hotel in San Francisco's swanky Nob Hill neighbourhood. A short walk from the iconic Golden Gate Bridge, this is still one of the city's most upscale hotels. In the 1950s it was the pinnacle of West Coast glamour, with giant marble pillars in its luxurious lobby. For one week that October, it was also ground zero for more than 500 of the world's most prominent bankers, businessmen and politicians.[7]

By the time Abs arrived at that San Francisco event, he was a legend in the world of international finance. 'His appointment in 1937 as head of the Deutsche Bank's foreign department established him at 36 as the Wunderkind of German banking', TIME would later write about him, describing how on top of becoming head of that bank he also joined the boards of directors of twenty-five big German companies and was so busy that 'much of his decision making is done on airplane flights'.[8]

This celebrity banker was born in Bonn – the western German city founded by Romans, and home to Beethoven, T-Mobile and the Haribo candy company – more than a century ago, in 1901. He'd studied law, as his father had, before deciding to pursue a career in banking. After a series of apprenticeships, in Europe and New York, he joined a Berlin bank and quickly rose through its ranks. Hitler then came to power, planning occupations in Europe, and supporting fascist allies in Spain.

Abs' further rise in the financial world took place under the Nazi regime – but it didn't end with the fall of the Third Reich. Rather, it seemed to have taken on new and increasingly international dimensions.[9] He never joined the Nazi party himself, though the Deutsche Bank had handled its accounts. After the end of the war, he was exonerated of actively supporting the regime by an Allied Denazification Board. Then, he took over an agency overseeing support to German businesses under the Marshall Plan, focusing on heavy industry.[10]

In the 1950s, it was Abs who helped settle Allied war claims against Germany, for which he received an Order of Merit from his government. In the 1960s, David Rockefeller, president of America's massive Chase Manhattan Bank, called Abs 'the leading banker in the world'.[11] He never left the Deutsche Bank, staying on its board, and as honorary chairman, until he died in 1994.

In the archives of the UK newspaper the Independent, we found an obituary which billed him as 'the outstanding German banker of his time'.[12] It was written by the late Eric Roll, Baron of Ipsden and former director of the Bank of England, who described Abs as an advisor to various governments and the World Bank's private investment division, the International Finance Corporation.

Roll also shared a joke about the banker: upon arriving in heaven, he finds it dilapidated and in financial ruin. Abs quickly draws up a plan for the archangels: Heaven plc, with the Almighty as Deputy Chairman of the Board. (The implication: Abs would put himself forward as Chairman, above God, in a privatised afterlife.)

The edition of TIME magazine in which its supplement on the 1957 San Francisco conference appeared also more widely reflected the period in which the event took place – amid the Cold War between the US and Russia, as well as a wave of growing anti-imperialist movements in developing countries.

Between advertisements for Dodge cars and electric typewriters were letters from readers concerned about the Soviet space programme. Other articles focused on US fears about Russian technological innovation outpacing the West and who newly independent countries would align with.

Similar concerns were growing in business circles. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, elites, particularly from Europe, had a powerful system of control to rely on: colonialism. But it was cracking. Freedom movements threatened to destabilize it – or destroy it.

At the San Francisco conference, Richard Nixon, then US vice president, gave what TIME called a major speech that warmed the hearts of 'world-minded businessmen, apprehensive over a US drift to protectionism'. He reportedly proposed a raft of strategies and targets to dramatically increase international investment by US-based companies – including cuts to corporate taxes on foreign profits, using the international aid budget to support private businesses, and new international agreements and institutions to protect them.[13]

Earlier that year, Nixon had travelled across the Atlantic to Accra, in the Gold Coast (which was later renamed Ghana), to attend a different, historic event. Kwame Nkrumah, Ghana's first post-independence prime minister, had organized a symbolic midnight ceremony to lower the British flag and replace it with a new one. He also wore his old prison cap to the official closing of the West African country's UK-controlled parliament.

Along with Nixon, that ceremony's attendees had included Martin Luther King Jr.[14] Interviewed on the radio while he was in Accra, King said 'this event, the birth of this new nation, will give impetus to oppressed peoples all over the world. I think it will have worldwide implications and repercussions'.[15]

Indeed it did. Ghana's independence was seen as a key moment in anti-colonial liberation struggles across the continent. Foreign companies and investors who had struck gold – actually or figuratively – under colonial regimes were feeling the earth shift beneath their feet. Across Africa there were industries that could be nationalized by newly freed nations; inherited deals, special concessions and vast landholdings that could be taken over.

Eugene Black, then president of the World Bank, also spoke at the San Francisco conference and insisted that 'people must come to accept private enterprise, not as a necessary evil, but as an affirmative good' – while governments must do more than 'tolerate' business. 'They must welcome its contribution and go out of their way to attract it and even to woo it.'[16]

When it was the German banker Abs' turn to speak, he denounced 'the well-known attitude of some less developed countries, according to which the Western world is actually obliged to pay for the advancement of their economies'.[17]

Dismissing possible calls for reparations, he instead presented an epic plan to fight back with 'a Magna Carta for the protection of foreign interests' and a new

'special international court of arbitration' to judge violations of it. TIME called it 'the most widely applauded concrete proposal of the conference'.[18]

More than just talk

In his speech, Abs referenced a number of high-profile disputes which he said showed why his proposal was so timely. Though, when we read his remarks, they seemed to reflect more about what developing countries had to fear from foreign investors, not the other way around. In each case, powerful, rich states had intervened militarily to protect corporate interests.

Abs pointed, for example, to Iran's 1951 nationalization of oil fields held by the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (later renamed British Petroleum). After this happened, the Shah, who had fled the country, was restored to power following a military coup backed by MI6 and the CIA. The US and UK denied their involvement in the coup for years but it was confirmed in declassified CIA files published in 2013 by the US national security archive at George Washington University.[19]

His second example came from Guatemala. Land reforms had threatened the holdings of the United Fruit Company (now known as Chiquita), which had since the late nineteenth century set up giant plantations across Latin America to grow fruit, primarily bananas, for export to the US and Europe. What happened next: a military coup in 1954. Again the CIA was involved (with files declassified in the late 1990s including an instructional guide on assassinations).[20]

Abs' third case was Egypt's nationalization of the Suez Canal Company in 1956. The company that had operated the canal was primarily owned by French and UK investors. Then what happened? The Suez Crisis, during which the UK, France and Israel invaded Egypt and tried (unsuccessfully this time) to overthrow its president. Again details took decades to come out but in the 1990s the BBC obtained a copy of a secret war plot, drawn up by representatives of the three invading countries at a villa outside Paris.[21]

Seeming to foreshadow investor-state cases like the ones we'd been investigating in El Salvador and South Africa, the German banker also decried 'indirect interferences with the rights of private foreign capital' – including cases of states refusing to allow companies access to 'essential raw materials' or grant them required licenses. 'Excessive taxation' was another of his examples of 'unfair' interference, which he said his proposal could help counter.[22]

The German banker's plan was to create a new supranational legal system through which investors could challenge foreign governments directly. It seemed to be the most ambitious, and most well-received, idea proposed at the San Francisco event. It was also more than just talk.

Abs, who chaired a group called the German Society to Advance the Protection of Foreign Investments, told his audience that lawyers were already working out the details of his plan, and that he hoped that a draft of his proposed convention would be ready to share with allies by the end of the year. The banker's California trip was just one stop on an international campaign trail promoting the idea.

There were some precedents for his proposal, we'd learn. In 1864, Napoleon III presided over an arbitration process between the Suez Canal Company and Egypt. In that case, the company had demanded compensation from the country for cancelling a canal construction project over its use of forced labour. The assembled tribunal sided with the company, deferring to what it called the 'sanctity' of the contract, and ordering Egypt to pay a massive penalty.[23] Reviewing this 'long forgotten' dispute in 2015, US law professor Jason Yackee wrote that the company's claim had 'a strikingly modern (and perhaps even timeless) character: under what circumstances, and with what consequences, can the government of the day change its laws in order to promote its conception of the public good, where the change negatively impacts, and perhaps even destroys, the value of the foreigner's investments?'[24]

Back then, such cases were heard on ad-hoc bases, without an institutional infrastructure. This is what Abs was proposing to change. In late 1957, just a few months after the San Francisco conference, he released as promised a draft 'International Convention for the Mutual Protection of Private Property Rights in Foreign Countries'. Two years later, he merged his ideas with a similar proposal from Lord Shawcross in the UK, producing the 'Abs-Shawcross Draft'.[25]

The prominent British lawyer Hartley William Shawcross seemed more closely linked to government than industry – which we imagined could have been useful for pitching the idea to states, which would have to sign up to it. A Labour Party politician and MP after the Second World War, he had been the lead UK prosecutor at the Nuremberg War Crimes Tribunal.[26]

Then president of the World Bank, Eugene Black, who had also been at the San Francisco conference with Abs, had his own experience in international investment disputes – including corporate claims for compensation from Egypt in the aftermath of the 1956 Suez Canal nationalization, which the German banker referenced in his speech.[27]

Born in 1898 in Atlanta, Georgia, Black came from an elite family of bankers. In the 1930s, his father was briefly chairman of the US Federal Reserve. After serving in the Navy during the First World War, he worked at an investment firm, then at Chase National Bank. After he became the World Bank's president in the late 1940s, he 'came to personify the Bank', according to the institution's account of his tenure, and it 'became widely known as Black's Bank'.[28]

The World Bank remembers him as a 'Banker-Diplomat' who was 'deeply concerned about communism spreading and its impact on the restoration of a functioning global, capitalist economy'.[29] His speech in San Francisco reflected this; he'd condemned a 'hostile attitude, by governments and peoples alike, toward the profit motive', and said they should 'woo' business instead.[30]

With Black at its helm, the World Bank expanded. It loaned increasing amounts of money to governments around the world, and set up new branches to directly support private companies too. He had a 'knack for bargaining and negotiating', wrote a bank historian in the 1990s, describing his 'international reputation as a mediator' and how he had been 'influential in settling foreign investment disputes' – insisting that countries come to the table with companies to negotiate deals.[31]

Along with the German (Abs), the Englishman (Shawcross) and this American (Black), two other men seemed to play particularly pivotal roles in the creation of the international investor-state legal system we had been investigating.

One was another American: George D. Woods, who took over as World Bank president when Black retired in 1963. Like Black, he'd previously been a commercial banker. In his first address to the World Bank's board, as its president, he pledged to explore 'all possible ways in which the Bank can help to widen and deepen the flow of private capital to the developing countries'.[32] Countries which accept this 'will achieve their development objectives more rapidly than those who do not', he insisted, clarifying: – 'that means, to mince no words about it, giving foreign investors a fair opportunity to make attractive profits'.[33]

The second was another European: Aron Broches. He had been part of the official Dutch delegation at the Bretton Woods Conference in 1944 at which the World Bank, along with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), was created.[34] Then, he served as the Bank's general counsel for decades. In the 1960s, he oversaw the creation of its ICSID centre for investor-state disputes.

New rules for the world

Woods oversaw a shrewd approach, it seemed, to establishing ICSID. He started to frame the nascent investor-state dispute settlement system as a 'modest proposal' – an ultimately simple idea that would benefit all and should encounter no opposition.[35]

In the Bank's Legal Department, part of Broches's job was to get governments from around the world to sign up to this idea – and for it to work, at least some would have to be poorer countries where foreign investors wanted to expand or protect their interests. The historical records we got in Washington DC seemed to reflect how he adopted Woods's approach.

Broches's draft ICSID Convention included language saying that no signatory state would be 'under any obligation' to participate in dispute resolution through the investor-state system, 'without [its] consent'. Signing up to the convention, the Bank's lawyers argued, wouldn't automatically allow investors to bring cases against states. The use of this system would be 'voluntary', said the rules they drafted; all parties would have to agree to use them; it would be based on 'mutual consent'.[36]

This was interesting – and, it seemed, deceptive. Did South Africa really agree to be challenged by investors who didn't like its post-apartheid policies, at an international tribunal that doesn't consider human rights and where states can only lose, settle, or walk away with the status quo and a giant bill for legal fees? El Salvador had made it clear that it opposed the mining company's case against it, and considered it a threat to the country's very independence.

Over the next several decades, investors' access to this new legal system was enshrined in thousands of international treaties. These agreements effectively give foreign investors the state's advance 'consent' to take them to tribunals including at ICSID. Broches would himself become involved in these deals – encouraging states to sign Bilateral Investment Treaties (BITs) including such provisions.[37]

According to British academic Taylor St John, who had studied this period, there was a Bank strategy to go to 'great lengths to avoid opposition uniting'.[38]

After previous attempts to set up such a system through the OECD or UN had ended in stalemates, St John said that 'the Bank was concerned that different strands of resistance would unite'. She described how it adopted a range of tactics to prevent this, including not circulating notes from consultations.[39]

St John also found that – despite promises that this system would increase foreign investment in poorer countries, and thus aid their development – 'no work had been done at the Bank to investigate this question, nor is there any record of any such work being proposed'.[40] ICSID, it seemed, was created for private investors, by bankers and lawyers, with states in the back seat.

As we dug further into the history of this system, we started to create a timeline of key events on paper taped to one wall of our room at the CIJ. Leaning back in our chairs, we saw something different from a system created with 'good intentions', for international development. We saw a small number of US and European elites, dreaming it up in boardrooms and ballrooms. We read their goals in their own words: to expand and protect business interests, including against 'aggressive taxation' and other policies that could limit profits.

What if, we asked ourselves, what we had seen in El Salvador and South Africa was not a system that had gone astray, or that had been corrupted? What if it was actually the system working as intended, pushing democracy and human rights off the table, and protecting profits above all else?

Amid the Cold War and as countries gained independence from dissolving European empires, this system seemed to have been sold to elites at spaces like the San Francisco conference before it was pushed on developing countries. Some of those with the most to lose were aware of this, registering their opposition to the idea at the World Bank's consultations.

Then, studying the records of ICSID cases again, after diving into this history, something else caught our eye.

For decades, almost all of these cases were filed by companies based in wealthy countries, against governments in poorer ones. This seemed to match the vision of this system's creators, and the enduring rhetoric of how it should help development by increasing amounts of foreign investment. However, more recently, there had been a spike in cases against rich countries too – including Abs' Germany.

We saw in ICSID's online case database that a pair of suits had been recently filed against Germany, by a Swedish company. One of these was ongoing, over the country's decision to close down its nuclear power plants. The second was about a controversial new coal-fired power plant that seemed to contrast sharply with Germany's much-lauded promises to pursue an epic 'green energy' transition. It had ended – but as in the case of the Italian investors against South Africa, we had questions about its conclusion.

If Germany – sometimes called the 'grandfather' of this international legal system, because of Abs – could be challenged then any country, and thus every taxpayer and citizen, globally seemed to be at risk. We thought again of the questions that had driven us thus far. Were our elected officials actually in charge of less than they led us to believe? Why hadn't this system received more attention?

At the pub down the road from the CIJ's offices, Gavin appeared in the courtyard.

'Tell me everything,' he said, sitting down with us at a wooden table.

We slid across the table a piece of paper – one of our printed pages from the TIME supplement about the 1957 conference in San Francisco, which showed hundreds of elite delegates in suits sitting around dinner tables in a banquet hall with vaulted ceilings and chandeliers. We were pleased that Gavin, who always had something to say, seemed speechless. He read slowly. Finally he spoke: ‘A secret Capitalist Magna Carta, huh.’ He paused. ‘That’s a big deal!’

We nodded.

‘Where will you go next?’ he asked.

‘Germany.’

‘When will you go?’

‘Next week.’

Chapter 5
The boomerang

Vattenfall vs Germany

We landed at Bremen airport and drove to Hamburg, Germany's second largest city and its only major one that wasn't land-locked. Sitting in a harbour with the River Elbe running through it, it was an industrial port city that had also long been a financial centre and the home of the country's oldest bank and stock exchange.

It was late summer, and on either side of the highway from the airport giant white windmills reached into the sky, turning slowly – reflecting the country's drive to boost renewable energy. By 2014, renewables already accounted for 25 per cent of German energy but the government said it aimed to raise this to more than 40 per cent by 2025.[1]

Around the world, people were increasingly concerned about the consequences of climate change, and the role of the energy industry in potentially irrevocably damaging the environment. Germany decided to do something about this – and kick its coal habit. There were mass citizen and consumer campaigns – and new policies.

Amid these movements, a Swedish energy company called Vattenfall filed a case against Germany at the World Bank's ICSID centre over its controversial new coal-fired power plant just outside Hamburg. It said that a water permit granted by the local authority had unfairly impacted its profit-making ability – by limiting how much the plant could raise the temperature of the river – and demanded a stunning $1.6 billion in damages.[2]

It seemed to be a striking example of how the international investor-state legal system was now being used to challenge governments in rich countries too. German investors had filed dozens of claims against poorer countries. But in 2009, when Vattenfall filed this case, Germany found itself in the dock for the first time.

Other rich countries including Canada, the UK and France had also faced claims. These cases covered a wide range of issues – and included several challenges to environmental laws and policies – though there was very little information in the public domain about many of these disputes, including how they were resolved.

Vattenfall's case against Germany formally closed in 2011, but as in the suit brought by the Italian investors against South Africa, its conclusion took time to unpick. The dispute seemed to have been resolved outside of the tribunal's proceedings. A final document said the two sides had reached a settlement but this suggested compromise – that both sides came to an agreement getting some but not all of what they would have wanted. Was that the case?

We had arranged interviews in Hamburg to help us figure this out, and rented an apartment in the west of the city, which was also a hub for alternative music and political movements. We drove past the Rote Flora, a former theatre occupied by squatters since 1989, which had been at the centre of anti-gentrification campaigns. In the windows of apartments we saw the iconic skull and crossbones flag of the popular anti-fascist St Pauli football team.

During the 2017 G20 summit in Hamburg, this area would be the site of mass protests and violent clashes between police and protestors. More than 15,000 police officers were deployed in an astonishing militarization of the city. They ignored a decision from Germany's highest court allowing protestors to set up a camp; it was raided by police armed with batons and pepper spray.[3]

Not far away was also the site of a recent occupation of a neighbourhood park – one of three that was threatened by a 12-kilometer energy pipeline that Vattenfall wanted to build, to connect its coal-fired power plant to the city's grid.

We were going to meet some of the local environmental activists involved in this and other anti-coal campaigns – along with local politicians and experts who we hoped would know more about what had happened in the World Bank case. But first, in the morning, we'd travel across the river from Hamburg to the tiny village of Moorburg, the site of the contested power plant.

There was no one on the one main road of the Moorburg village (population: 729). It cut through rows of red brick houses with sloped rooftops, and wound past a sixteenth-century church. The only open shop was a poorly stocked convenience store.

This tiny, quiet but picturesque village, on the banks of the river Elbe in northern Germany, seemed like an unlikely setting for a high-powered, multi-billion dollar international legal battle – and a growing, worldwide fight over how much power and control corporations should have in modern democracies. But, it had a new, controversial neighbour – Vattenfall's power plant: Kraftwerk Moorburg.

All we had to do was look up to see it: a giant chimney, steadily pumping dark grey smoke into the air. The smoke billowed as the wind picked it up, spreading it over the area. We walked towards it, until the giant industrial complex and docks around the chimney came into view. At ground level, much closer to the power plant, we saw loads of coal being lifted by machines off a large ship docked in the river. Here, Germany's historic renewable energy drive was nowhere to be seen.

This plant had been controversial long before Vattenfall filed its case. For years, local residents and environmentalists had opposed its construction amid growing concern over climate change and the impact the project would have on the Elbe – which is one of Europe's major rivers, flowing 680 miles from northern Czech Republic across Germany to the sea. Activists had organized protests against the project and public hearings under the banner 'Coal Kills the Climate'.

In 2008, when the Green Party came into power in Hamburg, in an unprecedented coalition with the Christian Democratic Union, it did so off the back of promises which included using all possible legal means to stop the Moorburg project from moving forward. After the election, we'd learn, they realised that this would be harder to actually do than they'd thought.

Totally absurd

After that 2008 election, local authorities in Hamburg gave Vattenfall the permits it needed to proceed with its plant, but they imposed conditions to limit its water usage and impact on fish in the river. These conditions were in line with European regulations, they said, but the company protested. In order to profitably run this plant its case filing said it needed a permit to allow it to return water to the river Elbe that was as hot as '30°C with a resulting temperature increase between water intake and outlet of the river water of maximum 6–7.5 degrees Celsius'.[4]

Vattenfall sued Hamburg in local courts – then it also went to the World Bank's ICSID centre. The permit conditions, it said, would cost the company too much to follow – constituting 'indirect expropriation' and violating its rights under the Energy Charter Treaty, a mega-agreement signed by more than fifty countries since the 1990s, including both Sweden and Germany, which granted foreign investors access to international tribunals in case of disputes.[5]

We asked Kersten, who we met in his office near Hamburg's central shopping district, to recall this period. He laughed. 'It was a total surprise for us,' he said, 'that there's even the possibility that they might do this [sue Germany at a tribunal in Washington DC] was, for me, totally new.'

'As far as I knew,' Kersten continued, 'there were some treaties to protect German companies in the Third World or in dictatorships, but that a European company could sue Germany … I wouldn't have thought this was possible.'

Kerstan had been the chair of the Green Party's group in the Hamburg state parliament, as well as the local official responsible for economic affairs and public spending when the ICSID case was filed. He described that period as very stressful. 'It puts a lot of pressure on the officials while such a process is in operation,' he told us, 'with no knowledge of what the outcome will be and what the federal government will do – are they willing to make compromises? Are they trying to put pressure on Hamburg? So, that was a very tense situation.'

It was 'totally absurd', Kersten added, that the company could go over Hamburg's head and sue the national government. It was a local dispute, and in the case of an award against the German government, it was suggested that the federal authorities might try to push it back to Hamburg and make the city pay.[6]

Kerstan didn't think he was alone in his surprise at this case, either. He said he thought that even those government officials who had signed the international treaties enabling such claims probably didn't know what they were getting into: 'I think they weren't aware that there's a risk of giving up sovereignty because they never thought that Germany would be sued.'

In the end, it turned out that Vattenfall agreed to drop its ICSID case if Germany gave it a new water permit for its Moorburg plant. According to a detailed legal analysis of permits before and after the case, this lowered the environmental standards that had originally been imposed on the plant – allowing it to use more water from the river and weakening measures to protect fish.[7]

In other words, it seemed like the company achieved what it really wanted. As in El Salvador (where the mining company didn't seem to want its damages award as much as it wanted to start digging for gold), and in South Africa (where investors gained an exemption to Black Economic Empowerment laws they didn't want to follow) this company got out of the water permit it had objected to.

Despite what was at stake, however, publicly available information was scarce.

'We tried everything we could do to get information from the government [on the case]. We have a special environmental information law here in Germany. We tried this too, and failed here too. We never got anything', Jürgen Knirsch told us, near the Greenpeace Hamburg office where he worked as a campaigner.

That office was in an old industrial area of the city that had been the focus of recent redevelopment. We met to talk by the waterfront where a suite of new shiny, modern office blocks, apartments, bars and cafes were being built.

Knirsch described the Moorburg case, from start to finish, as shrouded in secrecy. The World Bank's ICSID centre, in Washington DC, he explained, 'is so far away, and nobody knows what's going on, and the people, the local people, don't know anything either, they don't have any role in those processes, and of course at the federal level people … are trying not to talk about this very much'. Despite what was at stake, for local politics and the environment, 'here in Hamburg … we had no access to information'.

By then, we knew that this lack of transparency was, for those in the industry, a well-known feature and selling point of this legal system.

'The value and significance' of investor-state cases has grown, said the law firm Latham & Watkins, which had worked on dozens of these cases, 'as foreign investors (or their lawyers) have become progressively more familiar' with this system and how it can work for them. It told prospective clients: 'There can be no doubt that arbitration provides greater privacy and confidentiality than litigation (which is often public).'[8]

In the Moorburg case, Greenpeace had commissioned a local lawyer, Roda Verheyen, to analyse copies of the water permits before and after the dispute was settled. She concluded that the second one 'considerably lowered the environmental standards' originally imposed. It reduced, for example, the level of monitoring Vattenfall had to do and relaxed conditions on the plant's use of water from the river and its impact on its temperature.[9]

For Verheyen, it was 'undeniable' that the company's international case had put pressure on the water authority to revise the conditions attached to the company's permit. It had also brought the federal government into the picture, which would otherwise have had no role in the dispute.

The international case was only settled after Vattenfall received its new permit; the settlement seemed contingent on these changes being honoured and the company being allowed to proceed with its plans as desired. According to University of Hamburg academic Cathrin Zengerling, it was 'a clear example of how a confidential powerful international investment protection regime' can interfere with local democratic processes. The investor-state system, she argued in a book about international environmental law, 'was abused by Vattenfall to enhance its negotiating power'.[10]

Several years after this case was settled, the European Commission would take Germany to the European Court of Justice. It said the Moorburg plant's authorization had violated European environmental law by not doing more to reduce risks to protected fish species which pass near it while migrating from the North Sea.[11]

Germany meanwhile continued to reconsider and redirect its energy policies nationally – and soon it faced another investor-state claim from the same Swedish energy company, Vattenfall, filed in 2012 at the World Bank centre.

That time, Vattenfall challenged the federal government's decision to phase out nuclear power. Even less information was in the public domain about that case – despite reports that the company was seeking $5 billion from German taxpayers.[12]

Fed up in Hamburg

On the ground in Hamburg, many people seemed fed up with corporate control over their energy systems in general. This fit into another, under-reported international trend. Around the world, numerous cities were reversing the privatisation of key services – deciding not to renew contracts with companies, or cancelling them.[13]

In Hamburg, environmental, consumer and religious groups had succeeded in campaigning for – and narrowly winning – a referendum in 2013 for the city to 'remunicipalize' and buy back the electricity, gas and district heating networks that it had sold to Vattenfall and a German energy company decades earlier.[14]

Near one of Hamburg's many city parks, called Gählerpark, we met Astrid Matthiae, who had been active in the Moorburgstrasse Stoppen! campaign that preceded the referendum. It had mobilized people against a proposed 12 kilometer energy pipeline which they said threatened three parks and hundreds of trees.[15]

In late 2009, Matthiae told us, a dozen people scrambled up the trees in this small neighbourhood park, surrounded by apartment complexes. They built treehouses and small forts, occupying the park for three months in the winter.

'It was wonderful!' she said, describing a steady stream of visitors trundling down the park's slippery paths, bringing food and supplies to the protestors.

From the trees they had strung up banners reading: 'This park belongs to us all!' and 'Save the trees!' It was about protecting local green space – but also opposing the pipeline that would have connected Hamburg to the Moorburg plant.

Activists in the campaign against the pipeline wanted the entire project to be cancelled – and for the city's energy system to be run more democratically, with decisions considering the reality of climate change and sustainability goals. Protesters came down from Gählerpark's trees in 2010, after a court ruled to temporarily suspend the pipeline's approval.[16] But anger continued to grow over Vattenfall's coal-fired power plant.[17] Demands for greater local control over the energy system became increasingly mainstream.

Eventually, Hamburg joined a growing number of cities worldwide deciding to end their experiments with privatisation. Since 2007, we learned, at least 170 municipalities in Germany alone had already brought privatised energy services back into public hands.[18]

'Every month there is a new town that is buying back its energy infrastructure. This is very common right now', Christian Maas, former state secretary for the environment and urban planning in Hamburg, told us. He described the city's residents as more 'interested in local energy supply and that is contradictory to the centralised, high profit-orientated large utility'.

Remunicipalization, Maas continued, could create opportunities to 'give something to the city, change the energy system, provide stable energy prices for the people, make the city less dependent on foreign imports and fossil fuels'.

Globally, between 2000 and 2015, researchers at the Transnational Institute in Amsterdam had also documented 235 cases of water 'remunicipalization' in thirty-seven countries, affecting over 100 million people.[19] Satoko Kishimoto, one of these researchers, pointed us to examples from Mozambique to Malaysia. 'This is not a minor trend: many municipalities have been disappointed with privatisation, with costs, with service quality,' she told us. 'Remunicipalisation is seen as a tangible response, a way to rebuild important social services, more democratically.'

In Hamburg, local activists banded together to launch the Unser Hamburg, Unser Netz (Our Hamburg, Our Networks)[20] campaign in 2010 after realizing that the city's contracts with private energy companies were about to expire. Environmental groups said that buying back the grids would give Hamburg more control over its energy systems, and enable it to really drive forward its transition to renewable sources. But the campaign brought out a wide range of supporters.

Consumer organizations pointed out that companies were simultaneously the owners of the city's energy networks, and the primary producers and buyers of energy – a bad situation for competition and consumers. Religious and anti-poverty groups meanwhile argued that energy networks should not be considered private property, and should be run for the public good rather than private profit. Remunicipalization rallies brought out middle-aged men in crisp suits alongside dreadlocked students.

David McDonald, a professor at Queen's University in Canada, had been studying for years such city-level campaigns to reverse privatisations, as co-director of the Municipal Services Project international research network. He described this trend as a global story that was unfolding largely under-the-radar.

'We have had this massive trend since the 1970s towards privatisation – an ideologically driven, powerful trend – which has created enormous debates. But now we are starting to see something happen, including outright reversals', he told us.

McDonald sketched out a range of motives for these campaigns. What he suggested they have in common is how hard ending privatisation can be. Challenges included potentially 'high legal costs, and companies suing', he said.

'It can be a very David and Goliath battle, if you're thinking of ending a contract with a big company.'

Hamburg's referendum motion to reclaim the city's energy grids from companies passed, but with only 50.9 per cent of the vote. 'It was a really tough political fight. It was very, very long-running and in the end it was very, very close', Kerstan, head of the Green party in Hamburg, told us. The ballot proposed not only to take back the energy grids, but to build 'a socially just, democratically controlled and climate-friendly energy supply from renewable sources'.[21]

Nothing would happen overnight, however, as the city would wait for its existing contracts with the companies to expire – a process that would take several years. Taking action before this could have left it vulnerable to corporate lawsuits locally – or the whole country at risk of investor-state claims.

In 2014, Hamburg closed a deal to pay Vattenfall €550 million to buy back the city's electricity grid. A company spokesperson said it was a 'fair deal' – but also hinted that the company had considered its options to challenge an outcome that it didn't like. 'Although Vattenfall has not disconnected from the electricity grid easily,' she said, 'this agreement avoids disputes.'

The contract for Hamburg's gas network was up next, while it would be several years before the much more valuable district heating grid would be back in public hands. In that case, Günther Hörmann at the Consumer Centre of Hamburg said there were concerns that the city might be overpaying for it. In 2018, reports said that the price ended up exceeding €900 million.[22]

Coming home to roost

While we were no longer inclined to believe that the investor-state dispute system was created with 'good intentions', it seemed true that it had changed significantly over time. It had gotten 'out of control', perhaps, driven in part by an elite industry of corporate lawyers, consultants, lobbyists and third-party financiers. It had enveloped the whole world like never before and it was now threatening democracy in rich countries too.

For decades, countries like El Salvador, or South Africa, were the key targets of the international treaties and tribunals that power this system. But this dynamic already started to change after the 1990s, in the wake of new mega-deals involving rich countries including the Energy Charter Treaty that Vattenfall used to sue Germany, and the NAFTA treaty between Canada, the US and Mexico.

NAFTA said – in the treaty's name – that it was about 'free trade'. But by signing this deal, the three countries also gave foreign investors advance consent to challenge them at international tribunals including at ICSID. Numerous investors made use of this and the number of cases soared.

Canada in particular had been hit by dozens of claims. In one of these, a US chemical company called Ethyl had challenged a ban on imports of gasoline containing a toxic additive called MMT. The Canadian government settled this case, paying out $13 million and repealing the ban.[23] In another example, a tribunal ordered Canada to pay millions of dollars to the oil and gas giant Exxon-Mobil, whose lawyers challenged requirements that investors in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador support local research and development.[24]

Cases that were still pending against Canada included one filed by the Lone Pine energy company, from the US, after the province of Quebec introduced a temporary moratorium on fracking under the St Lawrence River pending further environmental studies.[25] Analysis from the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives suggested that, overall, almost two-thirds of foreign investors' claims against Canada had involved challenges to environmental or resource management measures, laws and regulations.[26]

Canada was one of the few countries that chose to publish lists online of the cases that had been launched against them.[27] These cases challenge governments, and carry potential multi-million dollar and even multi-billion dollar threats. But taxpayers, who would ultimately foot these bills, were often left in the dark.

We learned that the UK for instance, where we lived and worked, had been sued (along with France) by the company that owns the Channel Tunnel for allegedly failing to provide adequate security around its entrance.[28] It was upset by transport delays caused when undocumented migrants were discovered trying to hide on trucks going through the tunnel between the two countries.

That case was heard at the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague – another venue, like the World Bank's ICSID centre, for such disputes. There was very little information available about it. The court's website included only a short summary, explaining: 'After France opened a hostel for refugees near the terminal … inhabitants attempted to reach the United Kingdom via the fixed link. The Claimants suffered loss and damage due to such incursions, which they claimed the French and United Kingdom Governments had a duty to prevent.'[29] While a 'partial award' was published siding with the company, details (including how much the two governments would have to pay it) were not disclosed in it.

The US had also been sued more than a dozen times under the NAFTA treaty. However, as far as we could tell from public records, it hadn't yet lost a case. This was 'evidence that even though trade agreements appear to treat all parties equally, the more powerful countries are usually more immune to trade challenges', said Maude Barlow, a veteran activist with the Council of Canadians civil society group, where Meera – the person who first sent us down this path – had also worked.[30]

Overall, US businesses had been behind about 20 per cent of the cases filed at ICSID by 2015, followed by British ones (8 per cent). That year, Eastern Europe and Central Asia were hit with the most claims. The second most targeted region was Western Europe.

With thousands of international investment treaties criss-crossing the globe, enabling companies to file these cases, few states were now off limits and citizens and taxpayers around the world were paying the price – even in Abs' Germany. This country, once on the frontlines of constructing and expanding this system, had become one of its victims too.

If it was built to ensure continued domination by companies and investors from rich countries, it was now being used against their own governments too. In our next investigations we'd see similar trends – how new systems to protect and expand corporate interests were effectively 'pioneered' in poorer countries, often under the guise of 'development', before expanding to threaten democracies everywhere.

PART TWO

Corporate welfare

Chapter 6
Aid-funded business

An unusual festival

Like many of our peers heading to summer music festivals, we got up at the break of dawn and took a train out of London. We were also en route to an event that would have many thousands of attendees. We were going to see one act in particular – and we were anxious about whether we'd be able to get good seats, close to the stage.

But there'd be no mosh pits and wellies where we were going: north to Liverpool, for the 2014 International Festival for Business. Its main sponsor – then Prime Minister David Cameron's Conservative government – had advertised it as 'the UK's most significant international trade and commerce showcase since 1951'.[1]

It would be 'an outstanding opportunity for businesses to forge new international commercial partnerships', Cameron said.[2] 'There couldn't be a more fitting host than Liverpool', he added, as it had 'powered Britain through the Industrial Revolution'.

This seemed to be correct: in the nineteenth century the port city was a key hub for industry and international trade, and for a period its wealth rivalled London's.[3] But much of the city's prosperity had been driven by one of history's most condemned businesses: slavery. Over the eighteenth century, its ships carried an estimated 1.5 million Africans across the Atlantic. For decades, it accounted for between 30 and 50 per cent of Liverpool's trade.[4]

It was an organized barbarism. An international 'triangle trade' shipped goods like textiles and guns from British factories to Africa; slaves to America and the Caribbean; then sugar, cotton and rum back to Europe. Banks and industries mushroomed to respond to the 'opportunity' of this trade. Liverpool boomed.

This history still echoed in some of the city's street names. Penny Lane, made famous by The Beatles, was thought to have been named after the prominent slave trader James Penny. Other streets were named after abolitionists.[5] Restored warehouses by Liverpool's historic docks now housed an International Slavery Museum. That was the area of the city where we went, as quickly as possible, after our train pulled into the station.

Our destination – the Cunard Building – was built during the First World War to be the headquarters for a company whose luxury passenger steamships ferried elites across the ocean. It was partly styled after Italian palaces, complete with marble imported from Tuscany. We walked up dramatic stone stairs leading to the building's main entrance.

The International Festival of Business's multi-week programme had sessions catering to companies and entrepreneurs in specific sectors from shipping to education, as well as those eager to expand into specific world regions. Many of these events, including the one we'd come for, were organized by UK government officials.

We walked into a historic ballroom with period detailing and vaulted ceilings. Men in business suits sat at circular tables with pristine white tablecloths. We spotted two empty seats, took them and smiled. Our table was indeed close to the stage.

'What's it worth?' asked the man who soon appeared at the podium.

Answering his own question he said there was '$70 to $100 billion of business out there', to which people in the room clapped. He grinned.

The amount of money he was talking about was vast, and comparable to the estimated size of the global cybersecurity, or magazine publishing, markets. But this event was focused instead on a trade that few people have ever heard of.

Nigel Peters was the man on stage. He was then head of a little-known British government unit called the Aid-Funded Business Service – which was set up to help UK companies win contracts funded by public money to help the world's poorest people.[6]

'The development and humanitarian aid business is there, it's significant business, and we're here to help you win some of that', he told the room, standing by a screen with a projected slide bearing the names of different potential customers – including UN agencies, the World Bank, and US and UK government departments.

'Welcome to the world of aid-funded business', he enthused.

'We see a lot of business opportunities around the work the UN does in peacekeeping, famine relief, disaster relief, emergency aid,' Peters explained, giving as examples: 'We see a lot of good opportunities, for those of you in products, in terms of famine and disaster relief related to both man-made disasters, which today we're seeing in countries like Syria and Iraq with refugee camps, and of course natural disasters.'

The men around us clapped again. It was striking that these crises, involving the deaths and displacement of many people, seemed like reasons for good cheer.

Eleanor Baha, his colleague, also seemed upbeat when she took the stage. Based in Geneva, amid one of the largest clusters of UN agencies, she was described as an 'attaché' for the UK's Aid-Funded Business Service.

'Why should you be looking at UN business? What's the point?' she asked, and answered: 'Well, for you as companies it's a good export market'.

'There's a definite "feel good" factor' that companies can get from working in this industry, she said, but 'perhaps most importantly, you are sure to get paid … The UN only places business with companies when the budget is already secure'.

After our trip to Liverpool we took another train from London – this time to Brussels, the unofficial capital of the European Union, to go to AidEx, which called itself a 'major platform for networking, making new contacts and doing business'.[7]

Inside a large convention centre, hundreds of business suits swarmed around exhibition stalls, some of them sipping glasses of wine. On tables were glossy corporate brochures and items like USB keys stamped with companies' logos. Hanging from the high ceiling were banners of major car companies – Ford, Toyota, Volkswagen.

Company reps at their stalls pitched goods and services to a host of NGOs, government units like the US Agency for International Development (USAID) and UN organizations that together spend billions of dollars a year around the world. On offer was everything from types of tarpaulin to the services of private security firms. In a pop-up café, attendees huddled in small groups, comparing notes on who had won what business the previous year.

AidEx said that exhibiting at its event helped companies 'raise brand awareness', 'generate new leads' and 'receive personal PR services'.[8]

A two-minute promo video on YouTube, with a cheerful pop soundtrack, illustrated the point.[9] 'How are we going to sell all of these products?' asks a cartoon figure in the video. A light bulb appears over the head of another figure, who suggests: 'Why don't we exhibit at AidEx?' As cartoon shipping crates pile up on screen, he proclaims: 'There will be buyers there who want to buy all of THIS!'

We hadn't heard much at the event about the fight against global poverty – the official mission of aid spending – however. On our train back to London, we wondered: why was the world of aid-funded business also so little-known? Aid is taxpayer money, and politicians often talk about it. So why were the companies who target these budgets usually off-screen?

The reality of aid

What is aid? 'Money given to help the world's poorest', was the message repeatedly heard by taxpayers who ultimately foot the bill. Both supporters and critics of aid seemed to similarly talk about it as if it were a direct transfer of cash from richer to poorer countries.

The Daily Mail, for example – a notorious aid critic – had launched a petition on Valentine's Day, 2014, urging the UK government to 'divert some of the £11 billion a year spent on overseas aid to ease the suffering of British flood victims'.[10] One signatory, a novelist from Gloucestershire, commented: 'We give millions of pounds in aid to India and China and never spend on our own. It's ridiculous.'[11]

Aid opponents had repeatedly made the same argument: that the UK was wrong to 'give', 'send', even 'pour' so much money into other countries each year. Aid supporters seemed to use similar language, presenting aid as a sort of international social security system that redistributes wealth from the world's rich to its poor. Politicians routinely did this too, pledging to 'give' aid 'to' specific countries.

But it was more complicated than this – and, as we saw in Liverpool and Brussels, companies were among the beneficiaries of these budgets.

The truth was that only a fraction of aid money was ever transferred directly to local governments or groups in poorer countries. Instead, much of it took a while to get anywhere – passing through sometimes long chains of contractors and subcontractors. Far from simple transfers of cash, when donors pledged aid money, there was no guarantee it would ever make it to the countries it was supposedly 'for'.

There are written rules, overseen by the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) club of rich countries in Paris, to govern what spending can count as official development assistance (ODA) – the formal term for 'aid'.

Such spending is supposed to have 'the promotion of the economic development and welfare of developing countries' as its main objective.[12] The rules are detailed – and they have also allowed donors to use their aid budgets for things you might not expect.

Donor governments have been able to 'give' aid as loans that have to be paid back with interest (thus making money off of them). They have counted 'debt relief' as aid – even if these were just debts that were cancelled or rescheduled, not new flows of cash.

OECD data showed that millions of pounds of UK aid never left the country, and was instead spent on things like military training for African officials, scholarships for international students at British universities and a 'study visit' to the UK for North Korean officials.[13] For years the UK had also counted pension payments to former colonial officers as aid – at a cost of £2 million in 2017 alone.[14]

'Budget support' is the technical term for aid that is given directly to poorer country governments, to manage and spend themselves. It amounted to $9.5 billion in 2014 – less than 6 per cent of total global aid spending that year ($165 billion).[15]

The rest of this money? Most of it was routed through a web of international agencies, NGOs and for-profit contractors and subcontractors. Much of it was used to buy things, or services, from companies based in richer, not poorer, countries.

This is where the business we saw upfront in Liverpool and Brussels came in. For companies in this industry, a humanitarian crisis seemed like an opportunity, while development aid served as a steady and reliable revenue stream.

The complicated rules that governed what spending can be counted as aid meant that it was hard to compare two aid dollars without knowing details of how they were spent. One may have gone directly to a poor government. The other may have gone to a private contractor who made a profit off of it.

Despite this, politicians and aid critics and supporters alike often focused on a topline target to spend 0.7 per cent of gross national income (GNI) on aid a year. Repeatedly re-endorsed at international summits since the 1970s, this target became a key benchmark by which donor 'generosity' was publicly measured. Sweden, Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands had met it in the 1970s.[16] Luxembourg followed in 2000. But the UK was the only G7 country to have done so, in 2013, when its total foreign aid budget reached £11.4 billion.[17] In 2015 it enshrined this target in law (though in 2021 it would reduce this spending to 0.5 per cent of GNI, citing the economic impact of Covid-19).[18]

Some experts argued that this target was arbitrary, outdated, and that it was based on old calculations of how much money developing countries needed.[19] The UK parliament's international development select committee warned that pressure to meet spending targets, no matter what, could result in poor decision-making.[20]

It also seemed like a distraction – a way to focus attention on overall budget figures while missing the details of how this money is spent.

In 2015, a new UK aid strategy would come out explicitly prioritising overseas development projects and spending that could 'strengthen UK trade and investment opportunities'.[21] Aid would increasingly be spent on projects to write 'business-friendly' laws, and support private investment in areas from infrastructure to agriculture.

The involvement of for-profit companies in spending aid money also seemed to make it harder to follow this money to the ground. Government guidance said bids for aid business should include breakdowns of overheads, salaries and profit margins. But if this information was indeed collected it was not published and rarely came to light.

Margaret and Mahathir

When Margaret Thatcher died in 2013, she was honoured with a ceremonial funeral – at a cost to taxpayers of more than £3 million.[22] It was held at St Paul's Cathedral, where just a few years before Occupy London had established its camp protesting economic inequality and corporate influence over government.

Queen Elizabeth II was only one of several very high-profile people who attended the funeral. Among the foreign invitees was Mahathir bin Mohamad, who had been prime minister of Malaysia at the same time as Thatcher in the UK – though for much longer. He stayed in power until 2003, then took over again in 2018, at the age of ninety-three.[23]

We'd noticed his name on a list of the guests because, a year before Thatcher's death, a former senior civil servant published an insider's account of the 1990s Pergau Dam aid-for-arms scandal.[24] It was this scandal that ultimately led to a new law to 'untie' UK aid from commercial interests and make sure it focused on poverty reduction.

The scandal concerned exchanges between Thatcher's government, and Mahathir's – and the use of UK aid for a new hydroelectric dam on Malaysia's Pergau River to 'sweeten' contracts with arms companies including British Aerospace (since renamed BAE Systems), which sold the country dozens of military jets.[25]

The insider account, The Politics and Economics of Britain's Foreign Aid: The Pergau Dam Affair, was written by Sir Timothy Lancaster. He'd been a civil servant at the Treasury department when this deal was secretly struck, and had sent a private memo to his superiors warning that it could 'create acute embarrassment to ministers and wasteful public expenditure'.[26] Then, when he subsequently took over as permanent secretary of the Overseas Development Administration (ODA), the agency in charge of the aid budget at the time, he advised against this spending going through.

Lancaster thought the proposed aid-funded project didn't make sense on its own terms as he believed there were cheaper ways for Malaysia to produce energy. He took the unusual move of insisting on a formal ministerial ruling before signing off on its budget. This signalled that he suspected something was wrong, and was what ultimately prompted a series of investigations into it, from the National Audit Office to major newspapers.[27]

The cover of Lankester's book recounting this period features a snapshot of the two prime ministers at the centre of the scandal, before it erupted. Malaysia's Mahathir looks straight at the camera, in a grey suit and mauve tie. Thatcher is beside him, in a black dress. The pair appear relaxed and on a table before them are two tea cups, left (or positioned) there to reflect an amicable meeting.

That photo was taken in April 1985, during a ten-day tour of Asia by Thatcher in which she met with Mahathir and publicly praised him for believing, as she did, in 'the advantages of the free enterprise system and the liberalisation of world trade'.[28] It was the first official visit by a UK prime minister since the former British colony became independent (in 1957).[29] It also followed what she would later call 'a bit of a sticky start' to her relationship with Mahathir.[30] He had previously adopted an explicit 'Look East' policy and had said that his country would buy British products only 'when it is absolutely necessary', showing 'a definite preference for non-British sources'.[31]

Thatcher had travelled to Kuala Lumpur amid efforts to woo Mahathir back. A speech she gave in the city was peppered with praise for his leadership. 'I am delighted to find, Prime Minister, that you too are devotees of privatisation and reducing the role of the state', she said. 'I admire your catchphrase "Malaysia Inc".' She added: 'Many of our companies are keen to do more business with Malaysia and I shall be doing my very best to convince you of all the merits of our companies in particular.'[32]

At a separate press conference during that visit, she pointed specifically to the construction giant Balfour Beattie, which would later be involved in building the Pergau dam. She also named Unilever, the giant British multinational 'consumer goods' company whose products include snacks and soap.[33]

By the time parliamentary inquiries began into the 'Pergau Dam Affair', Thatcher had left government – though she continued to lobby for big businesses. She reportedly received $50,000 per speech and worked, for example, as a 'geopolitical consultant' for the tobacco company Philip Morris.[34] She would have been an obvious witness for the Pergau enquiries, but she refused to give evidence.[35]

In Malaysia, the 'Pergau Dam Affair' led to a new, public sector boycott of British contractors.[36] In the UK, a powerful civil society campaign demanded that aid focus on ending poverty in developing countries – not supporting companies from home. In 1994, a British NGO called the World Development Movement launched a landmark legal case against the government's aid agency, arguing that its decision to support the Pergau dam had been unlawful. The UK high court agreed.[37]

In the wake of this scandal a new aid agency was created – the Department for International Development (DFID) – with its own ministerial post. An International Development Act, passed in 2002, required that all UK aid spending have the reduction of poverty as its primary focus.[38] Aid was formally 'untied' aid from UK commercial interests, opening up aid-funded contracts to international competition.

Many aid donors 'tied' some of their aid spending, officially restricting competition for contracts to companies based in their countries. In the US a small group of contractors, primarily based in the Washington, DC area, and known as the 'Beltway Bandits', had long dominated the USAID agency's business.[39]

US food aid, which fell under the department of agriculture, showed a similar pattern: a small group of companies dominating the business. Among them were the huge grain traders Cargill, ADM and Bunge. They had won the lion's share of the contracts to provide wheat and other commodities to be shipped from America to poorer countries on US-flagged ships.[40] (The shipping industry also benefited.)

The UK, because of the Pergau affair and the actions taken afterwards, was supposed to be different. It was supposed to be buying more of its goods and services locally, in developing countries. This made sense if the goal of aid was long-term and sustainable development – as this business could also help local economies grow.

But, in 2011, the NGO that had led the legal challenge against aid for the Pergau dam[41] sounded the alarm again, after then development secretary Andrew Mitchell reportedly linked aid to India with ambitions to sell BAE Typhoon fighter jets.[42] A few months before Lankester's book came out, there was a new flurry of reports about a small group of British, private consultants taking home six, even seven, figure salaries funded by multi-million pound aid contracts.[43] In 2014, according to UK government figures, more than 90 per cent of contracts still went to British companies (or British subsidiaries of multinational companies).[44]

UK aid-funded contracts also seemed to be getting larger, and harder for small companies to bid for. Companies were providing daily support, 'technical assistance' on specific projects, and designing and delivering huge programmes over many years. Increasingly they were being hired as 'managing agents', selecting and overseeing other contractors. They also conducted research and evaluated the results of aid projects.

A group of just eleven companies, it turned out, were winning the bulk of these contracts – and they seemed to have special access to the DFID aid department. Then top official Mark Lowcock wrote in an article for Supply Management magazine that it had created 'an arena for frank discussion' and to develop plans together with its 'largest strategic suppliers'.[45]

Not one of these top contractors was from a developing country. The multinational accountancy giant PricewaterhouseCoopers was among them, along with big European consultancy firms. Many were from the UK – including Adam Smith International, which was founded in 1992 by admirers of Thatcher's policies, and Crown Agents, which could trace its history back to 1833.

One empire to another

We were intrigued by Crown Agents' birth during the British empire and started to dig into its history. It wasn't well-known but, in May 2003, a small group of protestors had gathered on Buckingham Palace Road, in central London. They handed out pamphlets to passers-by and unfurled a banner that said: 'Agents of War and Greed'. The little-known company was 'still busy facilitating imperialism', they said, in 'that murky area between state and business that has become so central in the new age of corporate government'.[46]

What prompted that protest was Crown Agents' involvement in Iraq following the invasion of that country by US and UK forces. It had been named by the BBC alongside the US construction giant Bechtel as part of 'a fairly narrow coterie of international firms' that had developed a specialism 'post-war clean-ups'.[47] The Independent called it 'the first British company to win a contract in the American programme to rebuild Iraq'.[48]

This was one of the biggest UK aid-funded contractors. It was also likely the oldest – having transitioned from being merchants of empire to postcolonial development business. Its website said it's been 'innovating since 1833' and had a long history of 'accelerating self-sufficiency and prosperity'.[49]

The Office of the Crown Agents, as it was previously known, had provided the empire's middlemen: if colonial governments needed to buy something, they set it up. They initially fell under the supervision of the Secretary of State for the Colonies but operated independently, managing colonial investments and the supply of all non-locally made goods, as well as supervising construction projects and paying colonial officers' salaries and pensions.[50]

David Sunderland, a British business historian who wrote an in-depth study called Managing the British Empire, explained how their business expanded between the late 1800s and early twentieth century – with their staff increasing, for example, from around 30 people to more than 460. They also outsourced work to other contractors and employed a shipping agent, packing company and solicitors.[51]

Their strategy was initially to provide costly though quality services, according to Sunderland. But over time, they became 'more concerned with income maximisation'.[52] They began using their connections within the UK government, he said, 'to influence policy for their own benefit, leading to the construction of costly and uneconomic railways, the issue of high cost loans, and the purchase of expensive supplies'.[53]

When the empire collapsed, Crown Agents lived on and became a statutory corporation focused on the international aid and development industry. In 1997 – more than 150 years after its inception – it was privatised and converted into a limited company (wholly owned by a foundation).[54]

At the time of Crown Agents' creation in the early nineteenth century, 'chartered companies' – associations of private investors and traders that were forerunners of modern corporations – were busy exploring, trading and colonizing different areas of the world. Probably the most famous of these was the East India Company, which had its own flag and a private army twice the size of Britain's. This 'dangerously unregulated private company', according to William Dalrymple, who wrote a book about it, 'executed a corporate coup unparalleled in history', conquering much of India.[55]

That company would also take over parts of Southeast Asia and Hong Kong, while others colonized parts of the Americas and Africa. The 1884 Berlin Conference, which infamously formalized the colonial 'Scramble for Africa', would help them. Among other things, it said that a mere claim to territory was not enough for international recognition. Colonizers had to prove authority over the areas they claimed, through 'effective occupation'.[56] Chartered companies were willing and eager to help them do this.

In West Africa, from 1886 the Royal Niger Company brought together British interests in the Niger delta region. It had its own police as well as customs, courts and prisons.[57] In the early twentieth century it would become part of the broader United Africa Company (UAC) – and then Unilever, the British multinational 'consumer goods' company which Thatcher would mention in one of her 1980s speeches in Malaysia, and whose long history would later provide us with another unique window into that of the aid and development system.

When the British empire ended, we were learning, its infrastructure did not simply disappear. Some of it seemed to have been reoriented – or rebranded – under the 'development' banner. The aid industry had very deep roots. So did the issue of big companies being among its beneficiaries.

Chapter 7
Financing 'development'

Investing in empire

Then UK Prime Minister Harold Macmillan famously stated, in a 1960 speech at South Africa's parliament, that 'the wind of change is blowing through this continent, and, whether we like it or not, this growth of national consciousness is a political fact'.[1] He was right. By then, the British empire had already lost India, and what would become Sri Lanka and Pakistan, as well as Ghana.

'The upsurge of colonial nationalisms after 1945 meant that policy-makers were overtaken by events,' argued W. David McIntyre, a historian from New Zealand who studied this period.[2] But we were coming across plenty of evidence suggesting that businesses, investors and those in government who worked with them knew what was coming – unstoppable peoples' movements for freedom and independence from unaccountable powers – and that they started laying plans for continued expansions regardless. We'd seen this in the case of the international investor-state legal system we'd investigated, and we seemed to be seeing it again in international aid and development.

After nearly four centuries of colonial activity, the UK's empire collapsed in little more than two decades after the end of the Second World War. Before that happened, in 1946 the UK set up its 'development finance institution' CDC (initially called the Colonial Development Corporation). It had a mission to improve 'the standard of living of the colonial peoples by increasing their productivity and wealth' – though bringing the UK benefits, amid a struggling post-war economy, was also a clear objective.[3]

Addressing a meeting of colonial governors not long after this institution's founding, Sir Stafford Cripps, then Minister for Economic Affairs, said that it was time to 'force the pace' of colonial economic development and argued that the UK's future depended 'on a quick and extensive development of our African resources'.[4]

After the war, Britain's economy was struggling and the government took huge loans from the US which were only fully paid off in 2006.[5] 'This is the world background against which the productivity of the colonial territories must be viewed', Lord Trefgarne, CDC's first chairman, stressed to a group of businessmen in Liverpool, in 1948. It was 'sound policy' in this context, he insisted, to build up colonial economies and increase exports of their products.[6]

That the UK should benefit from this new institution's international 'development' activities was perhaps not surprising given that it was still an arm of the colonial empire. But like Crown Agents it didn't close down when the empire did. It was re-positioned to help newly independent countries 'develop'.

From the 1950s, 'development' became a dominant theme in corporate advertising in Africa, according to Stephanie Decker, a British academic who called it a cunning 'publicity strategy'. It was particularly important, she suggested, for companies 'that had been closely associated with the British empire … which needed to find a new justification for their continued presence'.[7]

Within the UK government, a new Ministry of Overseas Development aid agency was set up after the Colonial Office was disbanded in the mid-1960s. The CDC was renamed the Commonwealth Development Corporation, though it began investing in non-Commonwealth countries too. It resisted Thatcher's privatisation drive in the 1980s and remained a public corporation until after she left office.[8]

In 1999, the British parliament passed an act to transform it into a limited liability company – CDC Group plc – though all shares would still be owned by the government. A few years later, however, the entity's management functions were spun off into two new companies that were sold to private owners, including former CDC bosses: Aureos for relatively smaller venture capital funds and Actis, for the bulk of its remaining portfolio.[9]

These changes prompted criticism from politicians and the media over the 'impossibly low' prices paid for these spin-offs. Shortly after, then development secretary Andrew Mitchell applauded CDC's financial success but said it had 'become less directly engaged in serving the needs of development' and should be reformed.[10]

In 2011, a new business plan was launched, CDC began making direct investments again – rather than relying on intermediaries to spend its money – and it said that it would focus more on poorer countries.[11] Years later, it was again renamed (British International Investment) and its budget increased. However, it still seemed easier to pinpoint its elite beneficiaries than its impacts on helping to end poverty globally.

While we were in El Salvador, we saw one of the projects built by a company that had received 'development finance' from the UK's CDC. It was on the outskirts of the capital, behind thick concrete walls. Villa Veranda: a 34-acre gated community with more than 500 beige, brown and coral pink houses lining freshly paved roads; amenities including a football field and basketball court; and thick, green grass even in the dry season.

The cheapest homes inside this enclave started at $117,650 and required a household income of at least $2,000 a month.[12] This made them far from affordable for most people in the country, where about a third of the population lived below the national poverty line of $5.50 a day.[13] 'Being a construction company dedicated exclusively to the construction of houses for the middle class has given us dominance in that segment,' boasted the website of Avance Ingenieros, the company behind it.[14]

Its fortunes had been buoyed by growing numbers of Salvadoran bankers, bureaucrats and businessmen, and by a rise in Salvadorans living abroad buying property here for their families or retirement. It had also received a $3.3 million investment in 2004 from the UK's CDC.

While the enclave targeted much wealthier people than the world's poorest, its projects were also criticised locally for the pressure they put on water resources. Environmentalists said the rapid development of forests around San Salvador was replacing the capital's 'lungs' with concrete, asphalt and luxury homes out of reach for most people. Yanira Cortez, at the state's human rights office – who we met while investigating the mining company's investor-state case against the country – said that such 'mega projects' had 'severe impacts; on the environment and on water resources, not respecting the rights of future generations'.

A local group near Villa Veranda called the Northwest Santa Tecla Ecological Defence Committee had also warned that this specific development could threaten local water supplies, biodiversity and quality of life for communities nearby.[15]

The company said it had modified their plan to reduce the number of houses, include more green space and invest hundreds of thousands in local social programmes. But Edith Tejara from Acua, a Salvadoran environmental NGO, said it was still shocking that any international development money had supported it. 'History has taught us that whenever a shopping mall or gated community is built, water will be prioritised for them and not the local people', she said. 'What surprises me,' she concluded, 'is their idea of development.'

Billionaire beneficiaries

Our guesthouse in San Salvador had been around the corner from a wide street lined with towering signs of US fast food chains: Burger King, Pizza Hut, McDonalds, one after another. Behind them: shiny glass-paned office buildings. A large shopping mall. It looked like we could have been anywhere in the suburban US.

We walked along that road several times, to get taxis and go to that mall to buy snacks for our road trips, and a camera memory card. There were few other people in its shops, where products' prices were like Villa Veranda: out of reach for many.

Also like the company behind that gated community, the business behind this mall had benefited from 'development finance' – from a branch of the World Bank that invests in private companies called the International Financial Corporation (IFC).

Called Grupo Poma, that business was headed by billionaire Ricardo Poma who was a friend of Mitt Romney and an early investor in Bain Capital.[16] Founded in 1919, it was a conglomerate whose holdings included car dealerships, hotels, resorts, manufacturing plants and a growing number of shopping centres across Central America. During the Salvadoran civil war, the Poma clan had also allegedly backed the right-wing ARENA party that was linked to notorious death squads.[17]

There was no sign at the mall advertising the international development support for this company. But we later found 'Metrocentro' – the name of many Grupo Poma malls, including that near our guest house – in the IFC's online database of its investments.[18]

The Poma empire had received a $25 million investment from the IFC in 2003. This was about the same amount of money the Salvadoran government received in direct budget support in 2013 from international donors, according to OECD data.[19]

We found an IFC press release from the time of this investment which said it would 'significantly improve commercial infrastructure' in San Salvador. It also praised the company for 'stimulating local retailers, local employment, the related supplementary infrastructure and offering higher standards of retail at lower prices'.[20]

It was unclear how this investment could help meet the IFC and World Bank's goals to end global poverty and boost 'shared prosperity'.[21] Meanwhile it seemed clear that the company's commercial success was an objective.

The IFC's press release described Metrocentro as 'the largest shopping mall developer and operator in El Salvador'. It quoted IFC regional director Bernard Pasquier who said its investment would 'support an expansion of a competitive service oriented company'. Ricardo Poma was also quoted, saying the institution's support would vaguely 'facilitate the development of the formal retail sector in the country' – and specifically help his company to execute its 'continuous expansion strategy'.[22]

In the World Bank's database of IFC investments we found another $50 million given to Grupo Poma in 2010 to help build or refurbish hotels and shopping malls across Central America. In that case, the investment disclosure said it would 'benefit consumers' by providing safe and convenient shopping opportunities, and create jobs. But it was also explicit that beneficiaries would include international 'business travellers' – and the corporation itself, by 'strengthening its balance sheet' and playing a 'strategic role' as it 'expands into new markets (i.e. Colombia), where IFC is familiar with local business, economic and political conditions'.[23]

We found a further $35 million investment in the Poma empire in 2005, to build and expand malls in Honduras.[24] In 2016 another $45 million would flow from the IFC for Poma's further expansion in El Salvador, Nicaragua and Honduras.[25] In total we counted $165 million of development money over almost two decades. They seemed to start in 1998, with a $10 million investment in 'one of the largest shopping centres' and the 'first 5-star chain hotel' in Tegucigalpa, Honduras.[26] Grupo Roble (part of the Grupo Poma conglomerate) would develop and then co-manage the hotel along with the giant Inter-Continental Hotels chain. Subsidiaries of another company called Hillwood Investments would meanwhile develop and operate the mall.

We looked it up – and found that it was also a family company led by extremely wealthy people. Specifically – the family of Ross Perot,[27] a Texan business magnate with an estimated net worth of $4 billion when he died in 2019.[28] Before his company benefited from that IFC investment, he had sold a data processing company he'd founded to General Motors for $2.5 billion[29]; he'd run twice for US president[30]; and he owned one of the first copies of the Magna Carta.[31]

Washington follows London

The World Bank's IFC was set up about a decade after the UK's CDC. Its founding 'Articles of Agreement', drawn up by the bank's executive directors, came into effect in July 1956, just days before the Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal, sparking the 'Suez Crisis'.[32]

World Bank Vice President (and former executive of the General Mills processed food company) Robert Garner had been among the leaders who lobbied for the creation of such a branch to help private companies expand into poorer countries. 'It was my firm conviction,' he later wrote, 'that the most promising future for the less-developed countries was the establishing of good private industry.'[33]

The idea gained other powerful backers including Nelson Rockefeller, who headed the Truman administration's International Development Advisory Board.[34] In 1956, the IFC opened for business under Garner's leadership, with thirty-one member states.[35] Initially it could only make loans. The first of these went to an affiliate of a well-known German company, Siemans, to expand in Brazil.[36] From the start, it seemed, big companies from rich countries benefited.

By 1961, the IFC had gained the power to make equity investments too. The first was made the next year, when it bought a stake in FEMSA, a former auto parts manufacturer in Spain that's now part of Bosch – another German multinational company, one of the biggest in engineering and electronics.[37]

It began to talk more about the 'climate' for foreign investors – with their profit-making seemingly seen as synonymous with 'development'. Though we also found internally-aired concerns about its evolution. In 1974, when Robert McNamara headed the World Bank after his term as US defence secretary, he warned at an internal seminar that 'the closer the IFC moves to being a commercial enterprise, the less capable it will be to perform development functions'.[38]

Contemporary development insiders told us strikingly similar things. Luiz Vieira, coordinator of the UK-based Bretton Woods Project, an NGO that monitors the World Bank, said the IFC's 'drive for profit … skews the decision-making process around the selection of projects'. He thought it could be difficult for the IFC's staff 'to take a developmental perspective on what they're doing. That's not the type of people they attract and they don't focus on that'.

'Poverty alleviation, does IFC see that as its primary role?' a former senior World Bank staffer, who requested anonymity, asked us rhetorically.

'I think you could question that,' he said. 'They're pretending to be an investment bank … [and] there are examples of IFC making people worse off.'

Like the World Bank's ICSID centre for investor-state disputes, the IFC was not new but its size, reach and influence had exploded. Since its foundation, its ranks had swelled to 184 member countries, contributing nearly $2.5 billion to its resources – though the US still controlled 20 per cent of the votes on its twenty-five-member board.[39]

It made money – $1.5 billion in 2014[40] – which it said went into new investments, as well as other World Bank operations. It charged interest on loans it made to private businesses, and it profited from buying and selling equity stakes in companies. A controversial Bank programme called 'structural adjustment' appeared to have paved the way for this growth – conditioning loans to poor country governments on deregulation and privatisation campaigns.

The Bank's infamous 'Structural Adjustment Programmes' (SAPs) in the 1980s and 1990s included so-called Washington Consensus policy prescriptions. They required borrowers to do things like increase protections for private property, lower import taxes, restructure economies to focus on export industries and cut public spending.[41] They seemed to be copied and pasted across borders – and were criticised for institutionalizing countries' dependency on multinational companies, which entered or expanded in their markets and pushed out local producers.[42]

In the 1980s and 1990s, the Bank's annual meetings were met with mass protests. In 2000, more than 1,000 people were arrested at demonstrations outside its Washington DC complex, including a Pulitzer Prize-winning Washington Post photographer.[43] In 2002, the Bank then replaced its much-criticised SAPs with Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers (PRSPs), which were supposed to better involve poor country governments, and focus more explicitly on poverty reduction. But observers said their contents looked very similar.[44]

The IFC's share of total World Bank spending rose from 13 to 35 per cent between 2000 and 2013 (when it made more than $18.3 billion in financing commitments).[45] Its 'advisory branch' meanwhile counselled governments on how to attract foreign investors. There seemed to be deep potential conflicts of interest in the institution investing in companies, while also advising governments on policies that would benefit them. These and other policies should be up for democratic debate, not closed-door 'advice'?

A group of six NGOs argued:

> 'It is highly problematic for a multilateral institution to position itself as an objective source of policy advice on matters where it has a direct financial stake in the outcome, particularly in low-income countries that may not have the resources to procure advice from other sources, or in countries where weak democratic processes do not provide adequate checks and balances.'[46]

Civil society activists also pointed us to a case of water privatisation in Manila, the capital of the Philippines. It was the late 1990s and the IFC had advised the government on this privatisation, conducted the bidding for contracts to take over these services, and then invested millions in the joint venture that won the contract to supply water to the city's eastern half. By 2004, it had given it $75 million in loans as well as buying a $15 million equity stake in the business, becoming a part-owner.[47]

'Fifteen years later, residents of Manila have suffered under declining water quality and access,' said a report from Corporate Accountability International, a Boston-based watchdog. 'Hundreds of communities remain without safe water, and the cost of a connection, even where available, is unaffordable for many of the city's residents.' This case, it said, shows how 'profitability, not human access to water, is the primary incentive when the World Bank becomes a corporate shareholder'.[48]

Frederick Jones, an IFC spokesman, contested this. He told us in an email that access to water increased from 'just 58% of the population … in the 1990s to 99% today', and also that 'water quality improved greatly'. He added that the 'IFC has different departments handling advisory and investment services and we maintain strict divisions between them … When governments seek our services as advisors, we help them run a competitive and transparent process to find the best partner.'

But NGOs and activists weren't the only ones to raise concerns about possible conflicts of interest. Guillermo Perry, a former Colombian finance minister and former World Bank chief economist for Latin America, had argued that 'there is no doubt that dealing with both governments and private firms may create incentives or even [the] occasion for advising on a policy or regulation that is self-serving to equity or debt interests in particular firms or sectors.'[49] The IFC had also acknowledged, including in a 2014 report, that 'actual or perceived conflicts of interest can arise' from its multiple roles (though it claimed to have 'implemented processes to manage these').[50]

The Queen's diamond

In the mid-twentieth century when these international development institutions were set up, the next country we would go to, Tanzania, was at the forefront of the so-called Non-Aligned Movement resisting both US and Soviet power during the Cold War. The country's first independent president, Julius Nyerere, had been a prominent 'African socialist' activist and theorist. After he left office, he was still often referred to locally as 'Mwalimu' (Swahili for 'teacher').

In charge, Nyerere emphasized national self-reliance against foreign investment and aid. Putting this into practice included support for other African independence movements – and a sweeping nationalization drive that took power from private and foreign shareholders. Investors would be allowed back into the country, he'd said, when 'we no longer have any cause to fear the effect of their activities on our social purpose'.[51]

When Nyerere retired in late 1985, he was succeeded by President Ali Hassan Mwinyi who began a new drive to liberalize the economy. He agreed deals with the World Bank and IMF to reform the agricultural, industrial and financial sectors and reverse state-ownership. A new investment law was passed and a number of treaties were signed including with the UK, enshrining 'rights' for foreign investors and giving them access to the investor-state legal system.[52]

Foreign firms, including some ousted by Nyerere's nationalizations, returned. This time, they would be protected by that legal system. They would also have support from the international development system – including the World Bank's IFC.

The Williamson mine in northern Tanzania – the first major diamond mine on the continent outside of South Africa – was one of the many businesses taken over by the state in Nyerere's nationalizations. It had previously been run by the De Beers mining giant in partnership with the colonial government.

In the early 1990s, De Beers said it had been 'invited back by the government of Tanzania', amid Mwingi's liberalisation push.[53] It re-acquired 75 per cent of the mine which it held until 2009 – when a South African business called Petra Diamonds, listed on London's FTSE 250 exchange, bought its shares.[54] Then, in 2010, the World Bank's IFC came in and became a part-owner too, buying an almost $20 million equity stake as well as giving $40 million in loans for the mine's expansion.[55]

It was the IFC's first investment in diamonds – a luxury product par excellence – which is why it caught our attention. We found a press release from the time of the deal in which the IFC said the mine 'currently has a resource of some 40 million carats … and is renowned as a source of extremely rare, fancy pink diamonds' – but that it had been 'operating at a loss over the past few years'. Its cash would help 'return the mine to profitability', while its presence would also 'comfort' other potential investors and 'enhance Petra's image and credibility'.[56]

But how would its investments affect poverty reduction in Tanzania? The IFC said its millions would help 'maintain employment for about 1,000 people', and that it would 'work with Petra to ensure that the Williamson expansion is carried out in an environmentally and socially sustainable manner'.[57] It would also track how much money was spent on goods and services from the area, taxes paid to the state and a commitment from the company to spend 2 per cent of revenues on community development once its activities started returning profits.[58]

It seemed like a more clearly good deal for the company, than for poor local communities. We wanted to learn more about it, in person.

On our flight to Dar es Salaam, we tried to imagine a more extravagant gift than the flawless, 54.5-carat pink diamond Princess Elizabeth received on her marriage in 1947. It was likely worth tens of millions of dollars. High-quality pink diamonds are valued at up to $700,000 a carat.[59] It was embedded in what would become one of the Queen's favourite brooches – and had travelled more than 10,000 kilometers to reach her.

We were repeating this journey in reverse – from the UK to the source of this diamond: the Williamson mine. To get there, from Dar es Salaam we had to take another much smaller plane to Lake Victoria in the north of the country near its borders with Uganda and Kenya. At that airport, we were met by a Petra worker who drove us about a hundred miles to Mwadui, the site of the mine in Tanzania's Shinyanga region, one of its poorest. Most people were subsistence farmers who struggled with droughts, or cattle rearers.

As we drove together, this worker said he had heard we were journalists interested in how the mine was helping local communities. 'Yes', we nodded, keen to hear whatever he would be willing to tell us.

'The company controls everything, and not everyone is happy.' Without giving details, he said: 'It's all about Petra. That's all that matters. You'll see.'

The mine's property stretched over more than 1.5 square kilometers of land, and further into the distance than we could see. It included a gated complex of buildings and a hospital we'd read about in the IFC's files.

When we arrived we met senior managers to ask them about the international development money they'd received. Omari Hwin'dadi, the mine's financial manager, was effusive about the IFC's investments. He said Petra had got better loans than it would have with commercial banks. They were also 'very considerate', he said, in readjusting the company's repayment schedule.

Joseph Kasaa, who ran Petra's corporate social responsibility (CSR) programmes, told us its social programmes had been useful for its response to local critics. 'There was some kind of negativity from the community over the mine because they didn't see anything useful coming from it.'

Smoothing over relationships with disgruntled neighbours, and allowing the company to focus on what it wanted: diamonds and profits? It sounded far from World Bank and IFC goals of ending poverty and boosting 'shared prosperity'.

The next morning we went to speak to some of these neighbours. We learned that the mine-funded hospital was free for mine workers, but other local residents had to pay for treatment. Even if its fees were small, many were so poor they could not afford them. A school was likewise open to children of mine workers, but not to others in the local communities, unless they paid another fee.

At a government-funded school in a nearby village, we met teacher Joseph Makoba in a class of 108 children, crammed into one room. He said Petra had paid for desks and two teachers' quarters. But, he argued: 'These investors are in our country and they are reaping a lot of fruit, so they should at least provide something … What the company is bringing to us is peanuts.'

Another teacher, Veronica Masinga at a primary school in another nearby village, told us: 'I am not happy that we have to live on handouts and donations.'

'Because the community around the mine does not know their rights, they are in the dark, they are uneducated,' she lamented. This means that 'when we get these things we feel happy even though we are just being given handouts'.

Chapter 8
Buying power

No candles in Zanzibar

Tanzania had also signed one of the largest so-called compacts with the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) – a project of former President George W. Bush's administration to run aid more like a business. The idea was to set up a new type of aid agency – one which was funded by public money but was able to act autonomously, with a CEO at its head and a corporation-style board that was chaired by the US Secretary of State but whose members also included various money-making experts from the private sector.

Daniel Yohannes, an Ethiopian-American businessman, was CEO from 2009 to 2014. While still in that post, he told The Guardian's development professionals network – part of the newspaper's website that was sponsored by companies as well as some big NGOs – that his corporate 'background complements the role, because what I do here is very similar to what I did in the private sector'. He argued: 'If you want to do aid effectively then you have to approach development like a business. MCC wants to make sure that every single dime – whether $100 million or $400 million – is getting the best returns, both for American taxpayers who have trusted us with their funds and for its partner countries.'[1]

Over the phone from his office in Washington DC, the then MCC Vice President for Africa Jonathan O. Bloom told us that 'a range' of people had served on the agency's board including venture capitalists. It 'is specifically intended to be a non-government voice in guiding policy, so it's a corporation in that sense, but it's not General Motors', he said.

Bloom explained that the MCC will 'only work with selected countries'. He told us: 'We don't work with everybody. It's not based on US foreign policy priorities but a set of criteria that reflect countries that are basically well run, politically, democracies, market-based economies, and invest their money in their people.'

The idea was that once specific projects were identified, the 'partner country' would sign a 'compact' with the agency committing to complete them by a certain deadline. If they didn't achieve this in time, the money – which could be hundreds of millions of dollars – would be cut off.

Tanzania's first such 'compact', worth $698 million, was signed in 2008 during then-President Bush's whirlwind tour of five African countries in six days.

Bloom told us that 'conditionalities' attached to these agreements are typically 'policy related to whatever sector we're working on'. He explained:

> There are a set of conditions both before we approve and during implementation, but in Tanzania they relate to things like the government paying the arrears it owes to the electrical utility so that the electrical utility is solid, but it leads to keeping the tariff structure reflective of real cost so that the utility can invest and reinvest in household connections.

What the MCC essentially did was find a business-friendly policy reform a government was already invested in and then try to hold them to it. This incentivised having certain reforms, like energy privatisation, in the works.

In Dar es Salaam, Bernard Mchomvu, CEO for the Tanzania compact, echoed this. 'We had a few reforms here and there, tariff reforms mainly,' he told us. 'Before, power generation was done by Tanesco – the [state] electric supply company – but the government decided to open it up. When the MCC came, we were already in the process, but then they said, "this is a good thing, why don't you open up?" So whoever wants to invest in power is allowed now.'

A flagship MCC project at the time was a new 100-megawatt submarine cable that connected the island of Zanzibar, famous for resorts and white sand beaches, to the mainland's electrical grid. Part of the construction work had been contracted out to an Indian company, while a Japanese firm was involved in laying the submarine cable. John Sakia, a project manager at Tanesco, had the job of overseeing these companies' work, and together we drove to the coast to see the sea under which the cable extended.

Sakia told us the MCC had considered but rejected plenty of other potential projects to support, and that 'most of the projects which were rejected were distribution projects. This is a transmission project', to transport high-voltage electricity over a long distance. Distribution projects, which are instead transport lower voltages over shorter distances, could have helped get electricity into rural areas – where only 11 per cent of people had connections in 2014.[2]

Mchomvu had seemed unashamedly clear about whom this project benefitted – foreign tourists, and tourism companies, rather than poor Tanzanians.

'If you go to Zanzibar now, the hotels are very happy because they have very good power supply,' he'd grinned. 'Earlier it was frustrating for tourists because the hotel power went off at 10 pm, then you have to start using candles in the hotels … you don't come from Europe all the way to Zanzibar for candles.'

A new alliance for Africa

Tanzania had additionally signed up to what was called the New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa – an initiative launched at the 2012 G8 summit at Camp David led by then US President Barack Obama. It said it aimed to accelerate agricultural production and lift 50 million people out of poverty within a decade. But it had been condemned as a 'new form of colonialism' because of changes to seed, land and other laws.

This initiative's launch followed years of underinvestment in agriculture in Africa and the failure of rich countries to actually give much of the millions of dollars they had pledged for global food security at a previous G8 meeting, in 2009 in L'Aquila, Italy. Additionally, only eight African governments had met their own commitments, under what was called the 2003 Maputo accord, to invest 10 per cent of their national budgets in agricultural development.[3]

The New Alliance said it was innovative by bringing together governments and agro-businesses to drive change. It relied on the 'personal commitment of top-level leaders', according to a document from its 'leadership council' which brought African presidents together with the heads of aid agencies.[4] CEOs of giant companies including Cargill and Unilever also had seats.

There was scarce publicly available information about the initiative. But known details about companies' investment plans included references to cotton, biofuels, rubber and other non-food and export crops. As the years passed, it also became unclear how much of the aid money pledged by donors was actually new. The UK's Independent Commission on Aid Impact watchdog found that about £480 million most of the roughly £600 million that the UK said it would put toward the initiative consisted of 'pre-existing agriculture programmes which have been relabeled'. Companies also seemed to be 'mostly submitting existing investment plans to garner favour with governments, secure a seat in policy dialogue or to win good publicity'.[5]

Meanwhile, the African countries in their New Alliance 'cooperation frameworks' seemed to have made hundreds of policy commitments including promises to change laws and regulations in favour of agribusinesses. Burkina Faso, for example, committed to supporting private investment in fertilizer, and reviewing its seed law.[6] Ghana promised to appoint business representatives to a government food and agriculture committee.[7] Senegal promised to 'implement tax incentives' for agricultural investors.[8] Malawi said that it would set aside 200,000 hectares of land for large-scale commercial agriculture. Mozambique pledged to stop the distribution of free and 'unimproved' seeds except for in emergencies, and make it faster and cheaper for investors to acquire land.[9]

Million Belay, the head of the Alliance for Food Sovereignty in Africa (AFSA), warned that such changes could spell disaster for small farmers. 'It clearly puts seed production and distribution in the hands of companies. Yes, agriculture needs investment, but that shouldn't be used as an excuse to bring greater control over farmers' lives,' The skilled orator argued: 'More than any other time in history … outside forces are deciding the future of our farming systems.'[10]

Olivier de Schutter, then the UN's special rapporteur on the right to food, had also sounded the alarm. He said promises were being made to investors 'completely behind the screen', without the participation of small farmers.[11]

Tanzania had pledged to reduce or lift taxes on farm machinery and equipment, crops, seeds and seed packaging. It had also committed to facilitating imports of seeds and agrochemicals.[12] But even some of the country's politicians had been left in the dark about these commitments, until after they'd been agreed.

Zitto Kabwe said he first heard about the G8 initiative when he opened a newspaper in 2012. Then the chairman of his parliament's public accounts committee, Kabwe said he was critical of the scheme from that moment – and 'completely against' the commitments that his government had made to encourage private investment in seeds.[13]

'By introducing this market, farmers will have to depend on imported seeds … It will also kill innovation at the local level. We have seen this with manufacturing,' he said. 'It will be like colonialism. Farmers will not be able to farm until they import, linking farmers to the vulnerability of international prices. Big companies will benefit.'

'Something like this needs to go through parliament. The executive cannot just commit to these changes. These are sensitive issues. There has to be enough debate,' Kabwe said, of the projects and policy changes included.

Supporters of the New Alliance said that many of the companies involved were local firms. Tanzania's New Alliance cooperation framework listed nine Tanzanian companies and eleven international ones. But Kabwe said this was not quite accurate. Some of the 'Tanzanian' companies were actually locally registered subsidiaries of international ones. They also included the Tanzanian Horticultural Association, which was an association of companies working in the country, including several big foreign firms.

Tanzania's cooperation framework said the country was 'a showcase for public-private partnership in agricultural growth, exemplified by the development of its Southern Agricultural Growth Corridor (SAGCOT)'. Under that scheme, launched at a World Economic Forum summit in Davos, Switzerland in 2010, the government had earmarked nearly a third of the country's land for private investors' farms.

Kabwe said that the government should be investing in small-scale farmers instead. 'With large-scale farming, you are turning small farmers into mere labourers,' he warned. 'Yes there will be huge investment in the country. There may be improvements in rural infrastructure. But this will not liberate people from poverty'. Including small farmers in big companies' supply chains isn't enough, he added. 'Who determines contracts? The fear is at the end of the day you have small-scale farmers being exploited.'

Your charity's c-suite

In November 2014, readers of the Financial Times' 'How to Spend It' section opened up the glossy supplement that prides itself on being 'the benchmark for luxury lifestyle magazines' to a profile of Justin Forsyth, then head of Save the Children UK.[14] The NGO sector had been partnering with big business in unprecedented ways and Forsyth, a media-trained, former advisor to Prime Ministers Tony Blair and Gordon Brown, had overseen a wave of new deals.

He had 'increased the charity's income by £50 million ($63.5 million) per year since 2010', according to the profile which toured his favourite tapas restaurants and other locations including the Royal Opera House in London. Forsyth smiled for the camera, one hand in a pocket, the other arm leaning on the counter of an upscale gelateria – a genial portrait of the cosmopolitan businessman.

Corporate funding of large international NGOs was not new. CARE USA had collaborated with Coca-Cola for three decades. But such tie-ups seemed to be flourishing. Oxfam said that it was 'proud to be at the forefront of partnerships between the business sector and the NGO community'.[15] 'Teaming up with Save the Children to market a new or existing product could boost your sales, profile and customer base', said that NGO on its website. 'Associating your brand with the world's leading independent organisation for children could be really beneficial for your business and stakeholders.'[16]

Nuria Molina used to work at Save the Children. After leaving the NGO she described how such tie-ups affected a campaign against companies aggressively marketing baby formula in developing countries. While preparing this campaign, it had considered what allegations to include also based on whether there were any 'potential links with the company and aid workers in relevant case study countries, and to ensure the tone of the activities and outputs involved in the campaign did not put the broader corporate engagement strategy of the organisation at risk.'[17]

She warned, in a development studies journal, that 'NGOs, like many other institutions and companies, also tend to measure their success and influence in terms of size and income' – thinking like businesses, rather than strictly prioritizing their social goals.

In 2013, Save the Children unveiled an unprecedented £15 million partnership with the pharmaceutical multinational GlaxoSmithKline (GSK).[18] The year before, the company had been fined $3 billion in the US after pleading guilty for bribing doctors and encouraging the prescription of the antidepressant Paxil to children, even though the drug was unsuitable and unapproved for this use.[19]

One former staffer described this deal as 'a car crash'. The financial crisis was still having an impact on charity donations from the public at the time, and that 'even for some of the bigger NGOs the aftermath is continuing to create financial difficulties. Difficult choices are being made of the sort that really haven't been made for the best part of 15 years', they said. A consequence was a turn to corporate cash.

'Perhaps five years ago, the internal argument about whether to kind of hold your nose and take the money would have been more likely to tip against it. Those conversations are now tipping the other way', they told us. Results included 'a kind of self-censoring' instead of holding big businesses to account.

In the UK, many big NGOs were dependent on government funding for significant chunks of their annual budgets. This may have also ratcheted up the pressure to be open to business – as this openness had become the government's official policy. Justine Greening, then development secretary, had made this clear: 'At DFID our relationship with business has never been closer.'[20] She also said: 'I also want to work with civil society partners that recognise that the private sector is an intrinsic partner in successful development. Because … the reality is that everywhere in the world, people want jobs. And companies that aren't making any money don't tend to recruit or grow.'

A key problem, Molina argued, was that many corporate partnerships had been undertaken by NGOs in a 'very unsophisticated, unsavvy way': 'We still have a higher moral standing in the eyes of the public. Basically the sector has tended to partner with corporations selling this intangible but very valuable asset for very little and for sometimes for dubious projects. They are much better than us at negotiating so they got what they wanted from us very cheaply.'

She said that her NGO colleagues should also ask: 'You get Company A offering to do some small school in Ghana or something … but what is the rest of its development footprint? Is it lobbying at the WTO on intellectual property?'

Nick Dearden, at the campaign group Global Justice Now, said he believed the 'increased professionalisation' of many NGOs had brought with it 'this tendency to judge yourself like a business, how much you're growing'.

'Now fundraising just rules organisations,' he continued, and 'campaigning has become a form of marketing, how you get your brand out there, how you raise more money.' Meanwhile, 'there's no structural criticism of business'.

We're all partners now

Since the 2008 global financial crisis, the visibility and power of giant corporations in aid efforts had seemed to reach new levels. CEOs were sitting on UN panels discussing development priorities; NGOs and agencies like USAID were proudly partnering with companies from Wal-mart to Chevron.

For development organizations that typically relied on government aid budgets, which could be unpredictable, vary year-by-year and come under political pressure, business seemed to be a way to fill gaps or increase funds.

For companies, there seemed to be a growing menu of ways to benefit from and take advantage of aid and development efforts. They could, as we'd seen, make money from aid-funded contracts. They could get development finance to expand, break into new markets or turn around failing activities. They also had opportunities to influence public policy – and improve their images.

In New York in September 2015, UN member states adopted a set of seventeen 'Sustainable Development Goals' to replace the 'Millennium Development Goals' that had guided aid and development agenda over the previous fifteen years.[21] They included grand objectives to 'end poverty everywhere' and provide 'quality education for all'. Then-UN secretary general Ban Ki-moon called them a 'to-do list for people and planet, and a blueprint for success'.[22]

Along with these new goals, development institutions had talked about the need to move 'from billions to trillions' in financing to pay for this agenda. Teaming up with big businesses seemed to be presented as the only way.[23]

In a briefing with journalists ahead of the UN meeting in September, the chief US negotiator on the so-called post-2015 development agenda, Tony Pipa said that given 'the breadth and the ambition of this agenda … the resources are going to have to go beyond what governments themselves can provide'.[24]

Governments' aid to many poor countries pales in comparison to the foreign investment they receive, he added. The US was already using aid 'to leverage and catalyse other resources … [so that] it "crowds in" other types of investment'.

For companies, Pipa suggested that the > question of sustainability is something that I think they are struggling with themselves. From their own perspective as businesses, how are they going to maintain and continue to grow over time? … Frankly, they also likely see opportunity in emerging markets and areas of the world that are growing. Africa has a coterie of some of the fastest growing economies in the world.

During the same briefing to journalists, Jen Kates at the Kaiser Family Foundation non-profit organisation observed that 'there really has been a concerted shift and change in the conversation around the private sector'. She said that 'whether it's self-interest, economically driven, or due to their sense of being part of a global community', companies are now involved in international development activities a 'way that wasn't there 20 years ago, 15 years ago'.

A consequence of these trends, we'd learn, was that NGOs which you might otherwise expect to hold companies to account for their impacts on local communities and the environment are also their 'partners' in development. They've lost their independence and the space for scrutiny has shrunk.

Also in 2015, there was an international conference in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia about how to finance activities to achieve new Sustainable Development Goals.

Proposals from developing countries to set up a new intergovernmental tax body – under the UN's authority, with poor countries given equal say in how global tax rules are designed – failed to pass amid opposition from rich states.[25] The final 'outcome document' presented private finance as the future of development, encouraging investment and public-private partnerships.

In London, Nuria Molina, the former Save the Children staffer, said this raised many red flags. Having worked in the development industry for decades, she believed that many multinational corporations had become more involved in these efforts 'to combat perceptions that they are really ruthless'. And partnerships with businesses, she warned, often seemed to mean accepting an ideological belief that jobs and economic growth can only come through the private sector and a deregulated 'climate' for finance and investment.

'I think partially it's a very reactive trend – to fiscal trends in donor countries, to where to get money,' Molina told us, about new corporate-development partnerships. 'There's also an element of inferiority complex,' she suggested, on behalf of people who work for civil society groups and in the public sector, 'thinking the private sector is so much better, so much smarter, so much more glamourous.'

Professor at Jawaharlal Nehru University, in New Delhi, Jayati Ghosh meanwhile said that global development discussions had increasingly focused narrowly on poverty reduction, whereas until the 1980s they were 'essentially about transformation'. She criticised the UN's development agenda for focusing on 'ameliorating the conditions of those defined as poor, rather than transforming the economies in which they live'.

This, Ghosh had argued, took a very limited view of what poverty is.[26] Who creates – and benefits from – it is out of the frame. No one is to blame, and no one talks about wealth as, she said, this 'would then necessarily draw attention to the concentration of assets somewhere else in the same society'.

The result, Ghosh thought, was a misguided focus on 'micro solutions that are seen to work in particular cases', or 'magic silver bullets'. Out of the frame also were solutions such as tax reforms and action to ensure transnational corporations allow countries to pursue their own development objectives.

Among the giant corporations that seemed to increasingly share development stages with aid officials was Unilever, led since 2009 by CEO Paul Polman.

In 2014, the UK government had announced a partnership with the company to 'use new social business models to improve health, hygiene, and livelihoods for 100 million people by 2025', with each side putting £5 million into 'a research and innovation programme focused on affordable sanitation and safe drinking water'.[27] Then UK development secretary Justine Greening said:

> This partnership, the first of its kind, will combine our expertise and networks to help millions of the world's poorest people find jobs, improve water and sanitation and, ultimately, end dependency on aid. This is not just good for the developing world, it is good for Britain. The frontier economies we will be working to improve are ultimately Britain's future trading partners.[28]

Polman was also given a spot on UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon's 27-member 'High Level Panel of Eminent Persons on the Post-2015 Development Agenda'. Other members included senior politicians, such as then UK Prime Minister David Cameron, as well as Queen Rania of Jordan.[29] He would additionally help launch a new Global Commission on Business and Sustainable Development to 'articulate and quantify the compelling economic case for businesses to support the UN Sustainable Development Goals, mapping the ways that businesses can get involved, build competitive advantage and flourish'.[30]

At a 2014 Washington DC event, he told his audience that Unilever is 'the world's biggest NGO'. He repeated: 'We're a non-government organisation … The only difference is, we're making money so we are sustainable.'[31] While business-focused, he argued that Unilever could be an impactful development partner because of its sheer size. 'We have 2 billion consumers using us every day; we are in seven out of 10 households globally … If you have that scale and reach, it's an enormous possibility to transform markets.'

Unlever was indeed a massive corporation – one of the world's largest. In 2017, it would report more than €53.7 billion in turnover and €6.5 billion in profits.[32] Its products were sold in more than 190 countries and it had almost 150,000 employees.[33] It was one of the world's biggest advertisers, spending billions of dollars every year.[34]

But it wasn't a new company – nor were its activities in poorer countries around the world new, or its involvement 'development'. Unilever was about a century old; it was one of the world's first 'brand-based' multinational companies. Its long history had also been intertwined with that of empire – including in the Belgian King Leopold's brutal Congo colony.

Chapter 9
Aiding elites

Corporate colonialists

In the early 1880s, Lever & Co was one of the largest wholesale grocers in Bolton in the UK. Outside Manchester, the town was at that time a hub for Victorian enterprise with cotton mills, print works and coal mines. Friedrich Engels had visited and called it 'among the worst'; 'ruinous and miserable'; and with a main street that 'is even in the finest weather a dark and unattractive hole'.[1]

When they were in their thirties, two of the Lever brothers saw a new opportunity in making soap on an industrial scale, and marketing it to Britain's growing ranks of wage labourers who had some, but not much, money to spend. They invested in advertising and sold individually wrapped pieces of soap in eye-catching, brightly coloured packaging. And they started to search abroad for regular supplies of palm oil.

By the early twentieth century, the company's factory was using palm oil from Britain's West African colonies.[2] Then, they went to the Belgian Congo. William Lever, one of the brothers, was described by an English journalist at the time as 'of the Napoleon breed … born to marshal big battalions and win empires, if not in war, then in peace'.[3] A Belgian colonial minister called him 'fabulously rich, probably of good heart but also hard, who sees humanity as a vast engine of production without soul or desires'.[4]

In 1908, this Lever brother was granted control over 67,800 square kilometers of land in the Congo.[5] It was a huge slice of territory, more than twice the size of Belgium, and four times that of Northern Ireland. And, as his son later wrote about it, 'not a building was erected unless the plans had been passed by him', in what was 'his personal creation'.[6] What was constructed included a 'model' company town: Leverville, for plantation workers.

'For Belgium, Lever Brothers was an ideal partner, a company hailed for the social policies it had put in place in mainland Britain,' where they'd also built a 'model city' called Port Sunlight, in the suburbs of Liverpool, wrote Belgian academic Benoît Henriet. 'For the aging industrialist,' meanwhile, its operations and new town in the Congo were supposed to be 'the crowning achievement of his own brand of "moral capitalism".'[7]

It was interesting how both seemed to have converged on what sounded like a public relations plan to expand their interests. The reality was that Lever's plantations, run by local subsidiary Huileries du Congo Belge, also seemed to have used forced labour. Palm cutters failing to meet quotas were reportedly liable to detentions and whippings.[8]

The Lever brothers expanded in Africa, acquiring the Niger Company – one of the colonial 'chartered companies' that had helped to build the British empire. In 1929 this was merged with the African and Eastern Trade Corporation to form a new mega-subsidiary: the United Africa Company (UAC).[9] The next year Unilever emerged when the British family business merged with a Dutch margarine giant to create what The Economist would call 'one of the biggest industrial amalgamations in European history'.[10]

The UAC, like other big companies on the continent at the time, had worked closely with colonial governments and African 'middlemen'. As independence movements gained strength, it increasingly drew criticism and negative political attention. It thus got involved in a range of social and welfare projects, eager to be seen at the forefront of the 'new Africa'.[11]

And it succeeded – in the sense that it survived the end of colonization (as a Unilever subsidiary). In 1973, the Guyanese intellectual Walter Rodney would point to its parent corporation in his magnum opus, How Europe Underdeveloped Africa, as an example of a business whose fortunes were 'bound up with colonization'. The 'rewards' of empire spread, he said, such that Unilever factories around the world 'were participants in the expropriation of Africa's surplus and in using that surplus for their own development'.[12]

Rodney had argued that to understand the colonial period, you had to think about Africa's 'economic partition' which was invisible with 'no fixed or visible boundaries' unlike the political partition of the nineteenth century that could be a distraction. He'd also named 'the US-controlled IBRD' – the first branch of the World Bank, created after the Second World War – as 'one of the tools for the economic repartition of the continent'.[13]

By the time his book came out, the UAC had diversified into industries like timber, car sales, breweries, medical and office equipment, construction supplies, department stores, insurance, textiles, warehousing and shipping. It had interests in dozens of other countries in Africa and around the world, until in 1980 it was fully absorbed by Unilever.

Unilever also held onto its oil palm plantations in the Congo for a long time. Then, in the early 2000s, as war raged in the country, the company decided to leave. It reportedly made millions selling its assets while hundreds of people lost their jobs. Some said the company owed them wages – and fought for more than a decade to get them. The Congolese Supreme Court ruled in their favour in 2007, but the money still didn't reach their pockets. Some went on hunger strike in protest.[14]

Unilever's plantations were sold to a company called Feronia Inc, which was registered in the Cayman Islands and appeared to have no previous experience in palm oil. Within a few years, it had racked up tens of millions of dollars in losses and its stock price had tanked. It could have collapsed, but it was apparently rescued – by part of the international development system. In 2013, the UK's development finance institution, the CDC Group plc, invested $14.5 million in the company, purchasing 27.5 per cent of its shares as well as giving it loans. It then made further investments, and bought more shares.[15]

These investments were made despite the company facing repeated allegations of ongoing abuses on its plantations, and against nearby communities. It was also not the only case in which Unilever found itself connected to such scandals.

In India, a thermometer factory in Kodaikanal, in the hills of Tamil Nadu, run by a Unilever subsidiary had been accused of dangerously contaminating the local environment with mercury waste. These claims were at the centre of a viral music video by then 28-year-old Indian rapper Sofia Ashraf which borrowed the tune of Nicki Minaj's 'Anaconda'.[16] Eventually the corporation reportedly agreed on an undisclosed settlement with 591 former workers at the factory, ending these protests and a fifteen-year legal battle.[17]

In Indonesia, the company was criticised for buying palm oil from suppliers accused of destroying rainforests – and for allegedly using child and forced labour.[18] In the UK, Unilever's CEO Polman had protested against proposals to introduce a 'sugar tax' that were being debated as part of a new strategy to combat childhood obesity.[19]

Helping the 1 per cent

We put together another folder of notes to share with Gavin. It included timelines and lists of companies involved in the international aid and development system – as contractors or as 'partners', and as beneficiaries of investments.

The names in these notes included that of a private healthcare company in India that marketed 'specialty hospitals' to local elites and international 'medical tourists'. Controlled by billionaire brothers Malvinder and Shivinder Singh,[20] it had received a $100 million investment from the World Bank's IFC branch.[21]

Other beneficiaries included the empire of late Honduran oligarch Miguel Facussé Barjum, who died in 2015. The IFC had invested in his corporation, Dinant, which had 20,000 acres of palm plantations in Bajo Aguán, Honduras, and had been accused of using a private security force to forcibly evict families from nearby land. The Los Angeles Times had described him as 'colourful' and 'often ruthless'.[22]

The Hunt Oil Company had also received IFC support. This company was founded in 1934 by a Texas oil tycoon and conservative political activist, Haroldson Lafayette Hunt Jr. It was then owned by Hunt's son, Ray Lee Hunt, who had an estimated net worth of nearly $6 billion.[23] A natural gas project it operated in Peru received $300 million in IFC loans.[24]

There were more examples like this than we could possibly cover over lunch. Across Africa, Asia, Eastern Europe and Latin America, we had found 'development finance' being used for luxury hotels and retail complexes, private healthcare companies catering to elites and multinational supermarket chains with controversial records in terms of labour conditions and worker's rights.

The IFC had been repeatedly criticised for such investments by civil society groups which in some cases also documented serious harms to local communities. In 1999, amid such criticism, the institution set up an 'independent accountability mechanism' called the Compliance Advisor Ombudsman (CAO). It's supposed to 'address the environmental and social concerns of people and communities' affected by its investments.[25] Some people, supported by human rights lawyers, had appealed to it with grave allegations including of forced displacement and violence.

We found detailed and sometimes damning reports produced by CAO investigators – but they could only recommend changes in response. They couldn't enforce them; there were no clear consequences if they were ignored. It seemed that little ever happened as a result of these investigations.

The World Bank's Independent Evaluation Group – another part of the bank's monitoring infrastructure that seemed to have no 'teeth' – had also repeatedly faulted the IFC for failing to clearly live up to its ultimate anti-poverty mandate. Most of its investment projects, it for instance reported in 2011, 'generate satisfactory economic returns but do not provide evidence of identifiable opportunities for the poor'.[26]

Gavin led us to a cafe near the university where we ordered sandwiches and took advantage of the otherwise empty room to pull two tables together and spread our notes across them. We also shared with Gavin what an activist had told us in El Salvador, about some of the UK's development money going to gated communities: 'What surprises me is their idea of development.'

Gavin thought about this. 'If these agencies are supposed to be progressive forces for development that prioritises the poorest, they're doing a terrible job. But,' he suggested, 'if you think development means that the rich get richer, and can expand as much as they want, then these institutions are perhaps working just fine. Doing great!'

Then we told him we had decided to go east next – to Myanmar, a country that was opening itself up to private investors amid the lifting of international sanctions and the introduction of a nominally civilian government. In 2014 the IFC had signed off on a huge $80 million investment there, and we wanted to see it in person.

Welcome to the Shangri-La

We arrived at Yangon International Airport just before dawn, and took a taxi into Myanmar's commercial capital as the sun was rising. We drove past a lake alongside which dozens of people were stretching and exercising.

We checked into a budget hotel in the centre of the city and then took a taxi to the IFC's office in a fancier part of Yangon. We were meeting the institution's top official in Myanmar, Vikram Kumar, formerly of Bank of America and India's Yes Bank. We sat across a large desk from him and explained why we were here: to learn about the IFC's largest investment in the country to date.

We had already read about it online: an IFC press release had trumpeted how it was helping to 'build business-enabling infrastructure in Myanmar, boosting tourism'.[27] The institution's $80 million was going to subsidiaries of a conglomerate called Shangri-La Asia Limited, to renovate and expand a hotel, as well as to complete the construction of a separate apartment complex.

We'd also read about the Malaysian billionaire whose empire this Shangri-La company belonged to: Robert Kuok, one of Southeast Asia's richest men. His family's holdings included one of the world's largest palm oil companies. He'd been doing business in Myanmar since the 1990s, when he partnered with Steven Law, a businessman and son of Lo Hsing Han, a notorious drug lord nicknamed the 'godfather of heroin'.[28] A leaked State Department cable said that Law was known in 'business circles as the regime's top crony'.[29]

Together with Law, Kuok had built the hotel in Yangon that the IFC's money would later help renovate. By the time we arrived in the city, the World Bank had become one of Kuok's more respectable business partners, helping to expand his chain of luxury hotels and resorts throughout Asia. The IFC had already invested $50 million, in 2009, in the construction of a 142-villa Shangri-La resort in the Maldives.[30] In 2012, it put another $50 million towards a new five-star hotel in Ulaanbaatar, Mongolia.[31]

We went into our meeting with Kumar sceptical about the IFC's choice to make Kuok's properties in Yangon the recipients of its record investment. We had read its account of expected impacts – creating jobs and 'demand for locally-sourced materials' and adding 'much-needed supply of international standard hospitality infrastructure to Yangon'. It argued that this 'will send a positive signal about Myanmar, particularly to other foreign investors who are considering investments in the country.'[32]

We wanted to know: had the IFC considered other major investments as alternatives, and why did they choose Shangri-La? Did this company really need international development money – surely it had its own, or access to commercial banks and investors? We left the IFC's office with few details, however. Kumar reiterated what we had already read on its website.

He said: 'We see it as business – enabling infrastructure, hotels – and it also fits under our jobs article, because of the number of jobs the tourism sector creates.' Kumar seemed to evade our requests for details: how many jobs, for example, and how much workers were paid, and how their rights were ensured. He repeated his main message: the IFC was helping to jump-start Myanmar's development by making it more attractive to international investors.

From the IFC's office we went to one of Yangon's main tourist attractions – the Bogyoke Aung San Market, a major bazaar named after the general who led Myanmar's twentieth-century independence struggle against the British. Inside, we saw cobbled streets and stalls selling everything from fabric to purses, gemstones and antiques, fried noodles and pig organs tossed in chili sauce.

But we had come here to go across the road – to the Shangri-La luxury hotel which had benefited from the IFC's multi-million dollar investment.

The hotel, which advertised 'stately elegance' and 'a blend of luxury with the warmth of home', was in Yangon's central business district.

The IFC said its investment would help pay for its expansion from 270 rooms to more than 450.[33] We craned our necks and counted more than twenty floors in a modern-looking building. It towered above others nearby and had a row of palm trees in front of it. We saw a limousine pull up to the front entrance and a well-dressed couple get out.

Bellhops waited at the front doors wearing gloves. We went close enough to the entrance to see an easel had been set up advertising a buffet dinner.

We then stepped through a metal detector into the lobby. Immediately, we felt the contrast between its opulent interior and the chaotic streets just outside. In place of dust and dirt there were sparkling floors and cleaners wiping away fingerprints from counters and side tables. Gone was any sign of poverty.

Its restaurant's extravagent dinner buffet featured many rows of freshly cooked dishes that were elaborately displayed with uniformed staff helping to serve portions. Guests in business suits ate fresh lobster and skewers of large prawns.

Up a flight of stairs, we found a well-stocked period bar and more suits gathered around aged whiskeys. A bartender slid us menus which showed prices that would be prohibitive for most people in the city – $15, for example, for a small plate of lime and pepper calamari tempura. We ordered a round of the cheapest, bottled beers and tried to talk to some of the other people around us. We met a private pilot who wasn't sure (or didn't want to say) what his presumably very wealthy client was in town for.

A British woman was sitting by herself, sipping a glass of wine. She said she worked as a teacher in Yangon, and liked to treat herself to an occasional drink at the hotel. We explained that we were following international aid and development money, and that had led us to the Shangri-La because it had received financing from a branch of the World Bank, whose mission is to end poverty.

She took a large sip of her wine and asked us to repeat ourselves. She was surprised that this fancy hotel could receive this money. We explained that we'd met the IFC's top official in the country that morning, and that he and the institution's documents said its multi-million dollar support would help create jobs and encourage more foreign investment in the country.

We could see that she was sceptical. 'For me, living here as an expat, it's fantastic,' she said after another sip. 'I can come here and get a glass of beautiful wine and use the Wi-Fi. But for the wider community? I'm not sure.'

The next day, we went to the newly built Shangri-La serviced apartments that had also benefited from the IFC's record investment in Myanmar.

Just north of downtown Yangon, we found the upscale complex of 240 luxury residences overlooking the iconic Shwedagon Pagoda – another major tourist and religious site – and a serene man-made lake. Marketed to wealthy expatriates and foreign businesspeople on extended visits, amenities included a pool, 24-hour private security, maids' quarters and a limousine service. Signs in a lobby said the complex now offered the Cartoon Network and yoga classes.

We had arranged to tour the development by posing as potential renters. We had been vague on details but had repeated buzzwords from its promotional materials while scheduling our visit: we were busy professionals, new to the city, looking for a home that was calm and convenient. We explained that we had seen an advert for the serviced apartments at the Shangri-La hotel.

A young woman in a tailored blazer and dark skirt said she was expecting us. Our tour began immediately as we followed her through the lobby into a courtyard with a pool. In the water were two young children playing with a beachball. Back inside the complex, we went up a stairwell to see one of the apartments – a fully furnished two-bedroom where everything looked brand-new from the floors to the dishwasher. Our guide walked over to one side and pulled open curtains to reveal the prize view of the pool.

She gestured to the bedrooms and said another model was also available with another small room that a live-in maid could use. 'We can even find a maid for you,' she smiled. 'If you live here, we'll do everything we can for you.'

While about half the population in Myanmar lacked electricity and there were just six physicians for every 10,000 people,[34] Shangri-La residents enjoyed unfathomable luxuries including an on-call private doctor and high-speed Wi-Fi. The price-tag for this treatment was high; apartments, we were told, went for as much as $7,000 a month.

According to the IFC's documents, the Shangri-La's expansion was expected to create 600 permanent jobs, and 1,000 temporary construction jobs.[35] It didn't sound like very much, for $80 million of development money, and a lot of questions were unanswered. Were the jobs created good? Were labour rights protected? And what other investments were considered?

We weren't the only ones asking such questions. In Yangon, we also met aid workers for both international and local NGOs who expressed frustration about such budgets going to very large private businesses. 'There is an increasing tide of scepticism and concern about these development projects and how they will benefit people,' one of these aid workers told us.

A former senior World Bank staffer, who later spoke to us on condition of anonymity, agreed that the Shangri-La investment seemed dubious. 'I'm not sure what the impact on poverty alleviation is,' he said. 'You could argue that there will be jobs for construction workers, jobs for people who work in the hotel, jobs in the suppliers to the hotel, but it's a very indirect kind of approach to poverty alleviation.'

Europe's Walmart

The IFC's investment database also showed several deals in Poland – including with multinational chains of supermarkets. They included Lidl – sometimes called 'Europe's Walmart' for its no-frills style. Its bright blue, red and yellow logo had become increasingly well-known across the continent, and in the UK – but so had its controversial track record for working conditions and rights.

In Germany, the magazine Stern had revealed that this company was spying on employees including with private detectives, as well as prohibiting bathroom breaks during work hours.[36] A Lidl executive conceded to the major newspaper Der Spiegel that it had 'made big mistakes' and had 'a lot of room for improvement – especially when it comes to transparency and the way we treat employees'.[37] In the UK, meanwhile, Lidl had been in the news for reportedly forbidding some Polish staff from speaking their language, including with Polish customers.[38]

In contrast to this notoriety, the company behind the chain was far from a household name. This was the Schwarz Group, established in the 1930s as a grocery wholesaler in Germany, that had since become one of the world's largest and fastest-growing retailers. The reclusive Dieter Schwarz was in charge. Intensely private – only a handful of photos of Schwarz were known to exist[39] – he was one of the world's richest men, worth an estimated $21 billion.[40]

According to the IFC's records, it made its first $100 million investment in the Schwarz Group in 2004 – the same year that German trade union Ver.di released its 'black book' on Lidl, documenting numerous alleged labour rights violations.[41]

This funding, the IFC had said at the time, would help the group expand in 'selected urban areas' in 'target countries in central and eastern Europe'.[42] Which specific countries was not made clear in its public communications announcing this deal. But on its website we found a list of addresses and contact details for this investment – including that of a Lidl corporate office in Warsaw, Poland.

In 2009, the IFC approved a second investment in the Schwarz Group – a $75 million loan to support Lidl's sister chain Kaufland to expand in Bulgaria and Romania. Then, in 2011, it approved a further $66 million for Lidl's expansion in Romania.[43] In 2013: more than $105 million for Lidl's plans to scale up in Bulgaria and Croatia and to open its first stores in Serbia.[44] In total, we counted about $350 million in IFC loans for the Schwarz's march across Europe.

Another development finance institution – called the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD) – had also given the Schwarz Group another nearly $500 million in the decade to 2015, and it had helped it to raise an additional more than $200 million from other, commercial banks.

It and the IFC made similar arguments about these investments – that the expansion of these supermarkets would create jobs, open new markets for local producers and bring quality, affordable food to poor consumers.

When we questioned the IFC directly about these investments, we were told this expansion had 'created new channels for local farmers to supply their products' while 'consumers gained access to a more affordable and diverse selection of high-quality food products'. But, a spokesperson refused to give us details on exactly how much of Lidl's products had been purchased from local producers, for example, or exactly how many jobs had been created.

'It is typical for financial institutions considering an investment in a company to sign confidentiality agreements to protect the sensitive information they review,' they said. 'We simply cannot disclose competitive information without consent of the company … and in this case, the information you request about the exact employment and local sourcing number is confidential.'

Like the IFC, the EBRD similarly claimed that it regularly monitored its investments' impacts – but that important data was 'commercially sensitive' and confidential. So we booked flights to Warsaw to try and learn more there.

Chapter 10
A new continent

Silent partners

Poland's capital and largest city was famous for the 1944 Warsaw Uprising led by underground resistance fighters who tried to liberate the city from German occupation. It also lent its name to the Soviet Union's 'Warsaw Pact' alliance to rival NATO. This was where the USSR began to collapse, in the late 1980s. After years of pro-democracy protests, semi-free elections brought a new coalition government to power.

In the 1990s, Poland moved to liberalize its economy – as Tanzania had after Nyerere – and began an extensive privatisation drive selling off state assets. It entered into its first deals with the World Bank and the IMF, receiving finance while committing to 'structural adjustment' reforms.[1] And it signed dozens of treaties giving foreign investors 'rights' to challenge it at international tribunals.[2]

Our first meeting in Warsaw was in the food court of a shopping mall, where we found Alfred Bujara, chairman of the retail section at Poland's Solidarity trade union. We wanted to know from him about the conditions for workers at the Lidl and Kaufland supermarket chains that had received support from the World Bank and the EBRD – and whether the presence of these development institutions had made a difference.

Through a union translator, who sat beside him, he told us that 'stress and intimidation is very high' in these stores. He described difficult working environments as well as cases of harassment and bullying by managers against workers who tried to organize. The union had struggled to reach people there.

Bujara had his own sources – such as individual workers who had reached out to Solidarity for help. But he told us that problems at the no-frills retailer had also been documented by the state labour inspectorate. These problems included repeated violations of national employment laws – including those requiring employers to give workers at least 11 hours off each day and 35 hours of uninterrupted rest each week.

Later we would hear about some of these conditions from workers who knew them first-hand. One of these people, Lukasz, worked the night shift at a Lidl warehouse, and would speak to us only after we confirmed that we could never print his surname, because he was afraid of reprisals from the company.

'We are overworked, we do the work that should be done by many more people,' Lukasz told us. He described feeling powerless; he needed wages, however low, and couldn't leave unless he found another job elsewhere. He told us that his wrists had swollen and that he had bruises all over his body from packing and unpacking heavy loads of fruits and vegetables. Other workers struggled similarly, he said, or worse, but all were fearful of speaking out because they were also 'afraid to lose their jobs'.

Despite national laws that were supposed to protect his rights – and the presence of international financiers who are supposed to prioritise development goals – he seemed to have few options in terms of recourse.

We had wanted to know if Bujara had been in touch with the IFC or EBRD, about the conditions for workers in the supermarket empire they were supporting. Had they tried to file complaints with these development bodies, for example?

He made his translator repeat what we asked several times. And instead of answering us he had many questions of his own.

The translator relayed to us: 'It doesn't make any sense.' We had brought printed copies with us of documents about these investments, and laid them out on the table between us. We'd highlighted in yellow the sums of money. Their eyes widened; they hadn't known about this financing. 'How could this be?'

At the Warsaw School of Economics, we met Jan Czarzasty who had been studying the expansion of multinational retailers in Poland. 'Everywhere where they open new stores, there are stories that come to the surface regarding working conditions; employee satisfaction is generally low,' he told us.

It was a clear pattern, he stressed, along with expansion strategies that include 'systematically penetrating smaller and smaller locations, smaller towns, in many cases villages'. Large chains can squeeze out local retailers – including small mom-and-pop shops that, for example, may not be open for as many hours – and fundamentally change rural economies.

'It's another variation of the Wal-Mart effect,' he told us. He acknowledged that some new jobs will be created by the expansion of big chains; but he also wanted answers to obvious, important questions: 'how many new jobs [are created]? And how many jobs are lost? We don't know that.'

Like Bujara, Czarzasty knew more about these workplaces than most. But he also seemed surprised by the development money Lidl and its sister chain Kaufland had received from the IFC and EBRD, and asked us for proof. We showed him the same documents we'd shown the trade unionist.

'This is very surprising,' the economist said, looking at the records.

We also visited the Warsaw Lidl office that was listed as a contact on the IFC investment record. There, neither the receptionist nor the colleagues she called could answer our questions. No one, in fact, seemed to know what we were talking about. Like Bujara and Czarzasty, they said that they hadn't heard of this money before.

At Lidl stores in the city, shoppers we stopped looked even more bewildered when we told them about the development finance the company had received. It seemed increasingly clear that you could work or shop there, or even study the company's expansion without ever knowing that it had been supported by these powerful international institutions, in the name of 'development'.

Shoppers also pointed out that Lidl wasn't even the cheapest place to buy groceries, and so it was very unlikely to be serving and helping the poor. Checking this online we found a 2014 survey that showed how a standard shopping basket at Lidl cost more than 15 per cent more than at other supermarkets in the country.[3] Local street markets could be cheaper still.

Weeks later, a company spokesperson finally responded to our emails and said its wages in Poland were 'significantly higher' than those at other retailers; its employees get benefits including free private healthcare; and Lidl 'has always been open to dialogue with employees as well as with trade unions'.

But they did not respond to our questions about the money it had received from these development institutions – which seemed almost like silent partners, giving cash and supporting private empires behind the scenes.

Post-Soviet profits

The IFC had been envisioned in the 1950s by its advocates from elite US political and business communities as a soft-power antidote to the spread of communism. But it did not close up shop when the Soviet Union did. Instead, its investments increased globally – including in former-Soviet countries.

These were the countries that the EBRD was founded to focus on. That institution's full name (the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development) closely echoed that of the World Bank's initial branch, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, founded after the Second World War. It was created by many of the same powerful Western governments in April 1991.

Its founding mission: to support former Soviet countries develop new private sector, capitalist economies. It offered financing for banks and businesses – including multinational corporations that wanted to expand into this region. It also encouraged the privatisation of state-owned companies.[4]

Like the IFC, the EBRD gave loans, guarantees, bought minority equity stakes in companies and offered a range of other financial services. It also worked with 'financial intermediaries', invested in other banks and through private equity funds, and was a major investor in power, energy and agriculture industries.

To be eligible for EBRD support, companies had to have a project in one of its target countries with 'strong commercial prospects'.[5] The bank said that it would support 'environmentally sound and sustainable development'.[6]

Like the IFC, it had also come under criticism from civil society groups who accused it of enabling giant companies to steamroll through the region. It was criticised for financing projects connected to environmental and social harm, including what the CounterBalance monitoring group called 'large hydro power projects that destroy biodiversity and coal mines which negatively impact livelihoods'.[7] Though it seemed even more obscure than the World Bank branch.

This was despite the fact that it had expanded beyond its focus on former-Soviet countries and also into Greece, Croatia, Cyprus and the Czech Republic as well as Romania, Serbia and Turkey.[8] It was headquartered in London, where we lived. The Overground we took to get to the CIJ flew by it.

But it was rarely discussed in the media and its offices blended in with the other commercial financial buildings in the area. Nothing in its coverage or appearance seemed to reflect how it was in fact a publicly-owned development institution.

The EBRD's offices in London, near Liverpool Street station, were in a large building with impressive windows and dark columns framing its entrance. They were in an upscale, mainly pedestrianized development called One Exchange Square which the bank's website proudly noted 'was inaugurated by Her Majesty the Queen' in 1991.[9]

'It was essential', the EBRD said, to find an office space that resonated with the 'modern, forward-looking, efficient' image it wanted to project. The space also had to be large enough to allow for its already-imagined expansion. Over the years it hosted 'many VIPs from the countries where we invest', along with music concerts and film screenings.[10] (Later, in 2022, the bank would move its headquarters to the Canary Wharf business district).

After returning from Poland, we went to this building to interview Gilles Mettetal, the EBRD's head of agribusiness. We wanted to confirm details of his institution's support for the Schwarz Group, and the expansion of its Lidl supermarkets. We also wanted to get his reaction to the concerns we had heard – from poor working conditions to impacts on local traditional markets. We wanted to know: Why had the EBRD injected so much money into the expansion of these stores? Surely the billionaire Schwarz's corporation already had the money it needed to expand, or could have found it elsewhere. Why would they spend limited development money like this? And what were they doing in response to concerns like those we'd heard?

We exchanged our IDs for temporary name badges at the front desk and took an elevator upstairs to a meeting room. Mettetal grinned as we sat down and began talking. He seemed proud of the EBRD's investment in the Schwarz Group's expansion. 'For the people, it changed their lives,' he exclaimed.

The company had provided a 'model that at the time didn't exist, which was targeting the lower social category, a poorer category, offering products to people who otherwise could not afford them', Mettetal told us. 'This is the credit I give them. They have been, yes, a quite commercially aggressive group, but they have people accessing products that they wouldn't have been able to access otherwise.'

Avocados and plastic surgery

Romania was another country where Lidl and its sister chain Kaufland had been expanding, with support from the World Bank's IFC. In the capital Bucharest, we took a small tour of these stores where we met customers like Camelia, an elegantly dressed woman who had just finished her shopping and was loading her groceries into her car outside.

'I like the avocados,' she said. But she found it hard to believe that Lidl had benefited from development money. 'Of course I know what the World Bank is,' Camelia said in the parking lot, 'and perhaps they could have found a better use for their money considering all the problems we have in Romania.'

In another neighbourhood, west of the city centre, another Lidl store seemed particularly busy. Shoppers crowded its no-frills aisles picking up jars and cans as well as vegetables and fruits that were fresh but often, we saw, bore labels showing that they had been produced abroad and then transported here.

Nearby, Ion Garalin, a small-scale trader, told us that he had sold locally grown vegetables at the Piata Gorjului market for more than two decades. Since Lidl opened down the street, he said, he and others had struggled.

'Really, the most negative impact is that they've chosen to open stores very close to local markets like this one,' said the then-67-year old, standing in front of his stall. Unlike the crowd we'd seen at the store, there was only a slow trickle of customers. 'We're being eaten alive … We can't go on like this,' he said.

From potatoes to apples, many of the same things were being sold at the market as at Lidl, and the store didn't seem to have cheaper prices. Those with little money still relied on street markets that were increasingly struggling themselves. Far from helping the poorest, it seemed to be limiting their options.

The IFC was also involved in the private healthcare business in Romania. Such investments internationally had been controversial – especially as the World Bank had also advised governments on privatising parts of their healthcare systems.

The NGO Oxfam had revealed that one IFC-supported private healthcare project in Lesotho was consuming 51 per cent of the nation's healthcare budget, while the company involved was reaping 25 per cent returns.[11] (The IFC challenged these figures, saying the project actually ate up 35 per cent of that budget. It was still huge.)

A separate $1 billion IFC 'Health in Africa' initiative, launched in 2009, had controversially focused on expanding private healthcare across the continent. It said it would 'catalyse sustained improvements in access to quality health', with a specific 'emphasis on the underserved'. But among its investments were facilities that were clearly targeting wealthier people – including a private fertility clinic in Nigeria where a single round of in vitro fertilization cost more than $4,600.[12]

Since 2002, the IFC had been advising Romania to 'reshape the country's healthcare system in order to encourage greater private-sector participation'.[13] In 2005, it also began to advise a company, MedLife, on the design and strategy of a new for-profit hospital. The next year, it made a $5 million investment in this business, which it called 'the first private hospital chain in Romania'.[14]

By 2015, MedLife still dominated the country's private healthcare market. Its clients included wealthier residents, expats and 'medical tourists'. Its services included 'the full range of surgical and non-surgical beauty procedures'.[15]

We made an appointment to visit this company's headquarters and were pleased to secure an interview with MedLife's president himself, Mihai Marcu, a stocky former investment banker with close-cropped hair. We met in his seventh-floor office overlooking central Bucharest. He was proud of the IFC's investment in his company, and unlike Lidl he was happy to talk about it. He boasted that it was a 'very special and unique thing … for the World Bank through their IFC division to become shareholders along with a family'.

He said this because MedLife was a family company and the IFC's finance for it had been in the form of a $5 million equity investment. It had bought part of the business, and had become a co-owner. For the company, Marcu said this helped its 'image' and to attract clients and staff. MedLife also benefited from the IFC's 'huge expertise' and invitations to learn from other private hospitals including in the US.

'Don't forget, my background is in banking and risk, so I always have an open door to the bankers in Bucharest,' he told us. He boasted that MedLife could have easily secured financing to expand from private equity firms or commercial banks. It partnered with the IFC because of additional benefits it would receive.

This jarred with the IFC's mission which isn't really to compete with commercial banks. It was supposed to invest where private capital could not otherwise be obtained, and where important development gains could be achieved. So we then turned to that second point – MedLife's development impacts. Marcu told us that more than 4 million Romanians had visited the company's facilities – or one in five of the country's total 20 million residents.

But he returned a puzzled look when we asked him how the company's activities helped to achieve the World Bank's stated goals of ending global poverty and boosting 'shared prosperity'.

Many people can't afford MedLife, he told us, in particular 'kidney and heart patients.' He estimated that only 20–30 per cent of them could continue their treatments with the company after initial appointments. What happened to the rest?

Marcu said they were 'referred to the state hospitals' – but didn't express much sympathy for them. He told us that Romania was a 'two-speed' society. Its poor people are poor, he argued, because they 'do not want so much to work'. Those are the people, he said, who can't afford MedLife: 'They don't want to develop and do things.'

We would have voted no

Ukraine was part of the USSR until its end in 1991. It was the poorest country in Europe, but it had extensive, fertile farmlands and had become one of the largest grain exporters in the world.[16] We flew into Kyiv to meet local activists who had been monitoring expanding agribusinesses – as well as the international development finance they'd received, and controversial impacts on the ground.

From the capital, we travelled more than 200 kilometers south to the Vinnytsia region, in the middle of the country's rural heartland. This was where a giant company, owned by one of Ukraine's wealthiest men, was expanding chicken farms with IFC help. Local people had complained of negative environmental impacts and pressure to give up their land to the expansion.[17]

We travelled with some of the activists we met. On the way, we learned how after the dismantling of Soviet and collective state farms in the 1990s, land was divided into small plots of roughly two hectares each and distributed among the population. There was a moratorium on sales of this land – but that was expected to be lifted in 2016 or shortly after. Meanwhile, big agribusinesses had already been acquiring huge swaths of territory via long-term leases of up to fifty years. This had fuelled concern over a 'quiet land grab', with land increasingly controlled by a few powerful people and companies.[18]

By 2015, foreign companies controlled an estimated 2.2 million hectares of farmland.[19] Big Ukrainian companies including Myronivsky Hliboproduct (MHP) – which was expanding its poultry farms with help from the IFC – were also major players. Its founder and chief executive was Yuriy Kosiuk, who owned 66 per cent of the company's shares.[20] He was also one of eight billionaires who were estimated to control nearly 6 per cent of the country's GDP.[21]

The IFC first invested in MHP in 2003 – then again in 2010 and 2013, providing it with loans including for 'crop cultivation and to secure the land lease rights'.[22] In 2015, it announced another, much larger, $250 million investment.[23]

In Ukraine, MHP dominated the domestic poultry market pursuing an aggressive 'field to fork' strategy, growing its own grain to feed its chickens and installing facilities to incubate eggs, slaughter animals and package meat.[24] It also exported chicken meat and luxuries such as foie gras across Europe, and it was listed on the London Stock Exchange.[25]

As soon as we arrived in the area near MHP's poultry farms, we were hit by the stench of animal waste. People living nearby said the smell and noise were constant and overwhelming. They described damage caused to roads and houses from the weight and vibrations of trucks driving day and night.

'Before, it was calm and peaceful here', said one man, showing us cracks in the brick walls of his small house, which he said appeared after these trucks began driving through the village. 'Now … everywhere, it's all broken.'

The IFC said that its investments in this company had created jobs and supported 'food security' in Ukraine and beyond. But, in villages near its expanding farm in the Vinnytsia region, people shrugged at this – and said that no officials seemed to be listening to their concerns about its negative impacts.

Some people said that they had been pressured into signing long-term leases with the company, giving their land over to the expanding farm – which was a massive complex with slaughterhouses, hen houses, fields to grow crops to feed the chickens and incubators for eggs.

Others told us that they'd written complaints to the company and local authorities but that no one was paying attention to them.

'There's no rights, no consultation', one woman said. She spoke to us anonymously, explaining that she was afraid the company would retaliate against her. People in her village, including the sick and elderly, had already been visited at home and coerced into giving their land over to the project, she said. 'We are nothing for rich people, they don't want to see us, or hear us.'

Several other people said company representatives visited villagers at home – knocking on doors and effectively forcing their way in. What they wanted was always the same: access to land for their expansion, as soon as possible.

When we later presented the IFC with these allegations, we were told that land acquisitions and environmental impacts were covered under its 'performance standards, which define our clients' responsibilities for managing environmental and social risks. If there are specific concerns or incidents connected with this investment, we will work together with the client to help address them'.

In a statement, the IFC added that it had invested in MHP to support poultry production in Ukraine 'which has created jobs and promoted the development of the agribusiness sector, a key driving force for the national economy', and that its finance had helped to improve food safety standards and energy efficiency. 'Despite the challenging economic situation, the company continues with its expansion programmes and, as a result, direct employment is expected to grow', it said.

Anastasiya Sobotyuk, MHP's head of investor relations and communications, described Ukraine as a 'food basket for the world' with great potential because of its famous 'black soil'. She said the company complied with local environmental regulations and built long-term relationships with local communities, often paying higher-than-market rent for the land it leased. 'We can't force people, because it is our reputation and we are here for a long time and need land.'

She acknowledged opposition but suggested that some critics might have ulterior motives, claiming: 'there are some people who understand our competitive advantages … and therefore do black PR campaigns toward MHP'.

Natalia Kolomiets, an environmental protection specialist at the National Ecological Centre of Ukraine (NECU), an NGO in Kyiv, was also worried about MHP's competitors. Big farms were the wrong approach for Ukraine, she argued; small- and medium-sized projects should be supported instead. Development institutions, she added, should pay closer attention to the perspectives and concerns of people living near the projects they back.

She said her organisation had received numerous reports of 'growing fears about potential ecological and health impacts, and extra pressure on local people to sign land lease agreements' near MHP's farms. But, she worried, 'it looks like once the business, the state and the investors are interested in having these projects, there is really little attention paid to local populations'.

As in other communities we'd visited around the world, villagers in the Vinnytsia area said they had never heard of the IFC arm of the World Bank – let alone its internal accountability mechanisms whereby impacted communities can file complaints if they have grievances. Instead of being consulted, they said they learned about the project when it was too late to effectively resist it.

'There should have been community discussions before building started, but there weren't,' a woman had told us standing near the village school where she works near the site of the expanding agribusiness empire. Instead, 'they just gathered us and confronted us with the fact that they were building this'.

'Had there been a vote,' she said, 'people would have voted against it.'

As with the international investor-state legal system we had investigated, the international aid and development system had also been created to shape poorer countries, but had since expanded to affect Europe too. It was helping companies to expand, but it also seemed there to help when they got into trouble.

'Imagine that,' Gavin exclaimed, as we told him what we had found. 'A global welfare system that actually works – just not for who needs it most.'

'It's weird, too,' he added, 'that capitalists, who always talk about competition and the risks they take, have this system to cushion their falls.'

Gavin always seemed to see through what he called the 'useful propaganda' those in power deploy to justify themselves. He had this in common with activists we'd talked to on the ground, from Central America to Africa.

'Are you going to take a break now? To figure out your next moves?'

We shook our heads. We'd seen something else that troubled us, in Myanmar.

PART THREE

Corporate utopias

Chapter 11
Fences up

Building control

Yangon, Myanmar's commercial capital, had been our main base while in the Southeast Asian country. It was the country's largest city, with more than 7 million inhabitants. It was also an ancient city, first founded in the eleventh century, that had survived several empires.

In the eighteenth century, while under the Konbaung Dynasty, the British colonial East India Company opened up a factory there.[1] In the nineteenth century, it became the capital of British-ruled Burma. In the twentieth century, it was occupied by the Japanese during the Second World War, then it became the capital of newly independent Burma in 1948.

It remained the country's political capital until 2005, when the military government relocated administrative functions north to a new, purpose-built capital city called Naypyidaw.[2] After that, Yangon was still the site of major anti-government protests including during the 2007 'Saffron Revolution' when hundreds of thousands of monks, students and other people flooded its streets – and state forces responded with mass shootings.[3]

We arrived in spring 2015, before Aung San Suu Kyi's party won a landslide victory in elections later that year, and before – in her new role akin to Burma's prime minister – she became the subject of global criticism for inaction in response to the genocide of the Rohingya people in Rakhine State, as well as for prosecuting journalists.[4]

Yangon looked like a patchwork of colonial-era buildings, some dilapidated and some renovated, alongside shacks, construction sites and the occasional slick modern developments – like the Shangri-La hotel which had received millions of international development finance from the World Bank's IFC – rising high into the sky with large panes of perfectly clean glass.

It was hard, we learned, to travel around Myanmar. Not because roads and internal flights didn't exist, but because to reach some areas – including where there were expanding industrial projects – you needed special permits, which we didn't have. We didn't try to travel under the radar to restricted regions. But we did leave Yangon twice. First, to go to Naypyidaw, often translated as 'Seat of the King', which was built in the middle of rice paddies and sugar-cane fields at a cost of up to $5 billion.[5]

We left just as the sun was rising, and drove north for five hours to reach it. Officially the city had a population of 1 million people, but it was eerily empty and silent on a bright Sunday. Newly paved streets were lined with flowers and pruned shrubbery; behind them were large detached buildings, villa-style hotels and shopping malls, all painted in soft pastel colours. There were golf courses, and a zoo complete with an air-conditioned penguin habitat. Restaurants had fast Wi-Fi. The only thing missing seemed to be people.

We stopped to talk to workers at some of the facilities. With no customers they had time to talk, but they seemed nervous and would not give us their names. They were clear about why, however: they were afraid of the state.

'It's not safe', said one man who had moved to Naypyidaw two years earlier, for work. 'The government has changed, but it's still the same.'

Roads had up to twenty lanes and stretched as far as the eye can see. The rumour was that they had been designed like this to enable aircraft to land on them in the event of anti-government protests. Naypyidaw's huge parliament complex had a moat around it. The city was laid out in large 'zones' with no natural Tahrir Square-style central public place in which to congregate.

An Indian journalist who had visited before us called it 'dictatorship by cartography'.[6] Control seemed hard-wired into the new capital's design. Stories of people forced to move there – or away – had also tarnished Naypyidaw's calculated triumph. The regime 'threatened to impose harsh prison sentences on, or deny pensions to, civil servants who refused to relocate', said a 2006 US diplomatic cable published by WikiLeaks, noting 'reports of several arrests'.[7] The surrounding area was 'depopulated in order to seal the huge compound off from the outside world', added a Thai newspaper. 'Entire villages disappeared from the map, their inhabitants driven off land their families had farmed for centuries.'[8]

Displaced in Myanmar

Our second trip outside of Yangon brought us face-to-face with another controversial mega-development: the Thilawa Special Economic Zone (SEZ), then under construction and part-financed by the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA), the Japanese aid agency. It was the first such zone we'd visit.

Over the last fifty years, we'd learn, more than half of the world's countries had carved out pieces of their territories in the form of SEZs like this one.[9] The International Labour Organization (ILO) estimated that more than 66 million people – about the population of the UK – most of them poor, young women, worked in more than 3,500 zones across the globe.[10] These were extraordinary figures. They meant that, if all of the world's SEZ workers lived in one country, it would be one of the world's twenty-five most populous.

In Myanmar, dozens of foreign corporations had already signed up to open factories in the new Thilawa zone, which had been billed as part of the country's 'big bang' economic transformation that could create many new jobs.[11] To entice them, investors were offered special 'incentives' including top-quality infrastructure and utilities that few people in the country had ever experienced. In other zones around the world, exemptions from taxes and national regulations were often on the menu too. What these places seemed to have in common, besides their names, was to effectively insulate capital from wider societies and democracies – while often promising that this would help drive countries' 'development'.

On the zone's border – we met 29-year-old farmer Aye Khin who told us he was among hundreds of people who had lost their land and livelihoods to it.

He welcomed us into the makeshift house he built himself, after his family home was bulldozed to make way for the SEZ. We sat on uneven floorboards and sipped small cups of tea as we listened to his story. He had grown up on land the zone now occupied. His and other families had been evicted and moved to a 'resettlement area'. They were given no choice – it had become prime real estate.

While Khin had managed to build a new place to live, he said it was worse than before and he no longer had space to grow vegetables or keep animals. He asked how they could have ended up impoverished and without hope in the midst of his country's economic transformation. 'All we have ever done is farming. And now we have no land', he told us. 'We have no hope, only despair.'

Other people in that resettlement area told us that the government should pay them compensation for the loss of their land, but that no money had arrived and they weren't clear how much it would be, if it ever did.

'I can't even sleep at night, because of the stress', 56-year-old Daw Win told us. She used to grow fruits and raise livestock before the zone took her land, but now lived 'day to day, worrying about meals. I have a lot of stress'.

We walked through the area, and closer to the SEZ-in-construction met 69-year-old U Mya Hlaing, whose home was still standing. Like others we spoke to, he described being left in the dark about the development and how it would impact him. He thought his home would be bulldozed soon – but he wasn't sure when, whether he would get any compensation for this, or where he'd end up. He was not opposed to the zone per se, but said that too many were paying too high a price for it. 'The people are suffering'.

These stories we heard near the Thilawa project weren't unique in Myanmar where there had been a historic rush by foreign investors to set up shop – and growing concern over an unequal distribution of the benefits (and costs).

The government appeared to be rushing through new laws and programmes to make the country more 'attractive' to foreign capital.[12] Local activists were bravely trying to organize to protect human rights and document violations, but told us this was very difficult. 'The villagers feel they cannot go against the government', one said, describing a constant state of unease and fear.

Frontier profits

Before we flew to Myanmar, we went to the country's embassy in London to interview its ambassador to the UK. We had wanted to hear from the government itself about how it was ensuring that its efforts to court foreign private investment served the country's wider development needs – and how the protection of its people's human rights was being factored into its economic plans.

We found the embassy on Charles Street in the upmarket Mayfair area of central London, around the corner from luxury shops like Cartier and Prada. It was also a short walk across Hyde Park from the Ecuadorian embassy which Julian Assange had entered in the summer of 2012, claiming diplomatic asylum, and where he'd live until spring 2019, when police entered the building and moved him to Belmarsh prison.

As we arrived at the palatial, five-storey townhouse, we saw Myanmar's ambassador get out of a black Mercedes and walk inside. We followed him, at a polite distance, inside and up stairs to a large sitting room with long sofas. Not long after, we were welcomed into an office where we formally met him – and Keith Win, a founder of the Myanmar-British Business Association (MBBA), who the embassy had arranged to join us.

Shortly after we sat down, and began asking our questions, we apparently made a tactical error: asking too early for responses to concerns over the country's human rights record. The ambassador abruptly got up, left the room and never returned. But our interview didn't end there. We were left alone with Win, who didn't seem to have an official position at the embassy, though he shared clearly rehearsed speaking points about foreign investment in Myanmar.

There were 'endless' opportunities for investors in the country, enthused Win, a smart-sounding businessman, part-Burmese and part-English. A chartered accountant, he had set up the MBBA in 1995 with the late Peter Godwin, a banker and advisor to the UK government's Department of Trade and Industry. Its website said it aimed to promote 'commercial dialogue' and to provide businesses from both Myanmar and Britain with 'a forum and networking'.[13]

'Myanmar has of course now opened up and gone to a market economy. It's early stages yet, but it's heading in that direction, and it's looking very positive,' Win told us at the embassy. 'The country has huge advantages – it's strategically located between India and China, two of the world's most populous nations.'

'Everyone is extremely busy,' Win continued.

> There's so many laws that have been passed, the reforms in place, government officials have been brought up to scratch, multilateral agencies are bringing in outside training. It all takes time. A lot of British businesses are interested, from education, services, architects, accountants, lawyers, lots of lawyers now looking at opportunities, Rolls Royce, power companies, some of the oil and gas [companies] … Opportunities are endless.

What he described sounded like a rush for newly discovered – or newly accessible – riches. 'Everyone wants to have an influence and get in, in terms of business,' he said. By the end of 2015, annual foreign investment into the country would rise to a record high of $8 billion.[14]

Myanmar – newly 'opening up' to foreign capital – seemed to offer an opportunity to see first-hand how international systems benefiting corporations expand and take root in new places. In other countries we'd visited, from El Salvador to South Africa, this moment had been in the 1990s, when we were children. In others, it had been earlier still, amid the Cold War and anti-colonial movements.

In March 2013, Thein Sein became the first-ever Myanmar President to visit Brussels – where he was warmly welcomed because of ongoing reforms. European Commission chief Jose Manuel Barroso said Myanmar and the EU were 'turning a page in their relationship … More dialogue, more and better aid, more trade and investment'.[15] The next year, the EU began negotiating an investment treaty with the country that it said would support economic growth, but that would also enable European companies to challenge it through the investor-state legal system.[16]

Also in March 2013, Myanmar signed on to the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards.[17] Under this international agreement, which first opened for signatures in the 1950s, states pledge to honour decisions from the tribunals that adjudicate investors' claims – both decisions against themselves, and against others. If another country refused to pay awarded damages, the treaty's signatories were supposed to seize their assets if they could (for example if they had money in foreign bank accounts, or planes on the ground at foreign airports).

According to local reports, only six lawmakers had been involved in weighing the pros and cons of signing it.[18] Aung San Suu Kyi was one of its supporters, claiming that it was a 'prerequisite' to attract foreign investment.[19]

Civil society groups including those representing rural communities seemed horrified – more aware than some lawmakers, perhaps, of what was at stake. They warned that integration into the investor-state legal system could undermine Myanmar's fledgling shot at democracy by strengthening rights for foreign investors and imposing new obligations on the state to protect them.

Precisely because Myanmar was in the midst of many reforms, they stressed, it should not give away its 'policy space' to enact change in the public interest by signing treaties that could make it harder, or more expensive, to do so. It also shouldn't do this without genuine democratic debates.[20]

The OECD club of rich countries was among the international institutions closely watching Myanmar's policy reforms. In 2014, it published a review saying that the country's laws were 'often ill-suited to an open economy' and judging it to be the world's second 'most restrictive economy' to foreign investment, after North Korea.[21] Later, this institution would claim that many of its policy recommendations 'were instrumental in a series of important reforms implemented subsequently that have significantly improved the investment climate'; that they'd 'strengthened the investor protection regime' and had assured investors that 'Myanmar is a secure investment destination'.[22]

The idea that Myanmar needed to assure large foreign businesses that it was a 'secure' destination for their profit-making seemed to contradict the gold rush-style imagery painted by Win at the London embassy, among others. The latter lined up with the propaganda of 'risk-taking' capitalism; the former did not.

The OECD's reports about Myanmar also reflected what we had decided to investigate next: how unprecedented amounts of territory were being carved out and handed to private investors, including as SEZs.

Foreign investors had been significantly restricted in what land they can buy or lease in Myanmar, the OECD noted, including by a 1987 law that forbade them from acquiring property rights for more than a year at a time. Reforms had started to change this. Now, foreign investors could partner with or invest in a Myanmar company to acquire land under the same conditions as domestic investors. A 2014 SEZ law allowed foreign investors located inside zones to enter into long leases up to fifty years, extendable for another twenty-five.

Not only in Myanmar were we struck by such lengths of time. Unlike politicians and even voters in democracies, who often focus on the nearer future (the next election, for example), the time scales involved in the systems and strategies that we were investigating were often decades-long.

Winners and losers

From Myanmar, this was the new idea that we brought back to Gavin: we next wanted to look into the secession of territory globally to private investors.

At a London think tank called the International Institute for Environment and Development, we found a lawyer named Lorenzo Cotula who had described how SEZs vary widely in their details, but that they often involve 'excluding or modifying the application of parts of the national law in defined geographic areas'.[23]

These weren't just carve-outs of physical territory, therefore – they were also exceptional spaces where normal rules didn't necessarily apply. These zones also seemed to often offer the – sometimes explicit – promise of a steady supply of cheap and compliant labour for investors' factories. The reality of promised jobs included numerous reports of worker's rights abuses in 'sweatshops'.

The ILO said 'trade unions point to these zones as being islands, outside the scope of traditional industrial relations … that are a symptom of the race to the bottom in the global economy.'[24] A worldwide patchwork of these spaces seemed to mean that, once one workforce began to mobilize and demand better wages or conditions, companies could leave and move on to another.

The World Bank, we found, had produced many reports studying and promoting SEZs.[25] Along with investing in private businesses, its IFC branch and other bank teams gave developing country governments 'advice' on how to make themselves more attractive to private investors, including what laws they should change. Such zones seemed to be a regular item on the menu.

In 2008, the IFC's Facility for Investment Climate Advisory Services described SEZs as > 'demarcated geographic areas contained within a country's national boundaries where the rules of business are different from those that prevail in the national territory. These differential rules principally deal with investment conditions, international trade and customs, and taxation; whereby the zone is given a business environment more liberal and effective than that of the national territory'.[26]

While governments passed laws, handed over territory and offered 'incentives' to investors setting up in such zones, we learned that a growing number of SEZs were themselves privately owned and operated.[27] Creating them – like challenging states with investor-state claims, and participating in aid and development efforts – had become a business in itself.

Among the varieties of these carve-outs were those focused on specific industries. We had to learn many new acronyms and terms, including export processing zones (EPZs), economic free zones (EFZs) and 'enterprise zones'.

The idea of 'incentivising' investors to set up shop in specific areas had also spread beyond zones established by national governments – cities and regions were also following a similar model, competing with each other for investment. In 2013, Washington state gave Boeing $8.7 billion in tax breaks, until 2040, to build its new jet in the Seattle area. It was at the time the largest (but not the first, or last) state tax subsidy awarded in US history.[28]

Local governments were 'stretching their necks out to compete over foreign direct investments – for every national agency, we have indeed approximately 50 at the local level promoting their economic interests', said an article on the World Economic Forum's website, describing cities as 'epicentres of power and capital'.[29] It noted, for instance, that a World Association of Investment Promotion Agencies (WAIPA) had 170 members – and over one-third were city-level or regional, rather than national, agencies.

A Columbia University study meanwhile estimated that around 8,000 subnational trade or investment promotion agencies existed globally.[30] World Bank research said such local agencies 'tended to be more innovative'.[31]

In Central America, a wave of carve-outs had been in the news. In 2012, the Honduran government proposed a seemingly radical new programme called 'Model Cities', envisaging the creation of new corporate-governed cities. Supported by the conservative US economist Paul Romer, the idea was to experiment with whole cities run by business-friendly regimes, with their own laws, tax systems, judiciaries and police. A Honduran Supreme Court ruled it unconstitutional, but proponents continued to push it.[32] And rather than truly radical, it seemed like another manifestation of trends we began following in Myanmar.

Patrick Neveling, then a researcher at Utrecht University, had studied SEZs for years. They are commonly 'regulated differently than a nation's "normal" territory, to the extent that they may have their own police forces with considerable sovereignty', he said

The idea of carving out territories for private investors had quite deep roots – including historical 'free zones' in Roman antiquity – which promoters of new SEZs sometimes drew on, he continued, as a way to make the model seem 'natural'. 'It's like saying: "Ever since we exited the Stone Age we've done this".'

The first modern zone like this was established in the late 1940s in Puerto Rico, Neveling told us. But because of where it was established – in a de facto US colony, which could make SEZs seem like an imperial imposition – he said this fact wasn't very well-known and a different origin story was often presented instead. Usually, Shannon, Ireland was the place that zone-promoters pointed to, as where the first such space was set up.

This, Neveling said, was a more strategic choice for those who wanted to see this model expand across the world.

> In the 1950s or 60s it was advisable to have Ireland – a country that can portray itself as a victim of English imperialism – come up with this concept, or to make it look like they came up with it … They were not a non-aligned country, but they were a nation that was supposedly outside of the western world – they were the poorhouse of Europe and so forth. This way you could sell this SEZ model to the rest of the world as a kind of postcolonial endeavour.

Neveling described Shannon as key to the development and worldwide expansion of these zones, even if it was largely in terms of propaganda and being the 'right' character for the story proponents wanted to tell. Among those inspired was China – which opened its first SEZ in 1980.[33]

'China's meteoric economic rise over the past three decades is an unprecedented "growth miracle" in human history,' wrote World Bank Economist Douglas Zhang in a 2012 report crediting SEZs with helping to drive the country's 'remarkable development'. These zones led to more money – investment, exports and worker salaries – but also policy change, he said. They 'tested the market economy … and became role models for the rest of the country'.[34]

When we next met Gavin, we told him how the story of SEZs sounded very different depending on who told it, and that we'd decided to leave next for Ireland – and then for China – to learn more about their historic zones.

'Wow,' he said. 'You're on to another huge story.'

He also found it interesting how Neveling described storytelling efforts to make these zones more attractive, and less 'imperial', by claiming Shannon instead of recognising Puerto Rico as their modern birthplace.

'Smoke and mirrors,' he murmured, then sat up straight. 'You need to watch out – and stay focused on what you care most about. How this impacts democracy.'

'It's a big deal if companies can insulate themselves from democracy inside these zones,' he continued. 'It's a bigger deal if these places become "role models" for entire countries to follow. Then it's not just about the carve-outs, it's about everything.'

Chapter 12
Irish invention

Bash on regardless

The Shannon river, named after the Celtic goddess Sionna, is Ireland's longest and largest. It winds 360 kilometers through the country, dividing western Ireland from its eastern and southern regions, before emptying into the Atlantic Ocean not far from Limerick, one of Ireland's oldest cities, founded by Vikings in the ninth century.

This river had featured prominently in Irish social, economic and political history. It had been a major trade route for generations. In the seventeenth century, it was also a strategic military front amid expanding colonization of the island by the English. After war came famine, bubonic plague, Catholicism's banning, and the indentured labour of thousands of Irish, some of whom were sent to work in other English colonies.[1]

We landed at Shannon Airport, on a cheap Ryanair flight from London, on the trail of contemporary, corporate empires. In the mid-twentieth century, the river's name was borrowed for this new airport – and then for a new industrial zone which would inspire SEZs around the world, including in China.

The airport was built during the Second World War. It had taken years to drain the boggy land on which it was constructed, on the river's estuary. A 1945 deal between Ireland and the US required all American flights to land or stop here, and gave Irish airlines exclusive rights to serve Boston, Chicago and New York.[2] After the war, commercial airlines used the airport for transatlantic flights to and from North America. It became that era's key 'gateway' to and from Europe; planes couldn't carry enough fuel at that time and had to stop here before, or after, crossing the ocean.[3] Numerous VIPs stopped here as a result, including JFK and Mohammed Ali.

We landed in Shannon late in the evening. We had only brought carry-ons and could have zipped through the building to the taxi rank outside but we took our time instead: this place was key to the investigation we'd just begun.

On a wall we saw a display of historic, black-and-white photos, from after the war, and stopped to examine them. The excitement of a boom time seemed to radiate from the images of dignitaries and celebrities waving from staircases leading them off of planes, or from luxury cars passing through crowds.

All of the airport's stores had closed by the time we arrived, including its duty free shop – the world's very first. Such shops are now as common as security checkpoints in airports globally, with shelves stocked high with items like alcohol, cigarettes and perfumes. But they'd started here, after a local entrepreneur named Brendan O'Regan convinced the Irish government to pass a 1947 Customs Free Airport Act, exempting transit and embarking passengers, goods and aircraft from normal customs procedures.[4]

That wasn't O'Regan's last big innovation, however, as he would also be instrumental in setting up Shannon's zone, earning the tiny town a reputation as far away as Beijing. SEZs like the one we'd seen being built in Myanmar, and like thousands of others around the world, could trace their history back to this place. We had a long succession of interviews planned over the next few days, but our education began immediately.

Our taxi driver from the airport was friendly and curious about what had brought us to his corner of Ireland. When we explained he chuckled 'Bash On Regardless', explaining that this was O'Regan's nickname, based on his initials and his reputation for being a visionary entrepreneur who never gave up. As we drove past a tiny town called Sixmilebridge he pointed out: 'He was born right here'.

Everyone who lived in Shannon long enough seemed to know the story of O'Regan, who died in 2008 at 90 years old, and his innovations.

'He was a great person to motivate other people,' Tom Kelleher, an economist who had worked with O'Regan in the late 1960s and 1970s, told us in his office in nearby Limerick. 'Anything was considered, no matter how outlandish.'

Born in 1917, towards the end of the First World War, as a young man, O'Regan had travelled abroad to study hotel management.[5] Later, he worked in the catering business. But he was best remembered for being a creative and serial entrepreneur – and for transforming this area through his most influential invention: the Shannon Free Zone, established in 1959.

At that time, Shannon's airport – and the town around it – was in trouble. Aircraft technology was advancing, and it would no longer be needed for refuelling on transatlantic flights. Instead, planes that were increasingly able to travel longer distances looked ready to bypass and simply fly over the area.

The town faced economic collapse. In response, the story went, O'Regan argued that Shannon would have to 'pull the airplanes out of the sky'. He appealed to the national government with a dramatic proposal to carve out the 'free zone' territory and offer foreign investors freedom from regulations and taxation if they moved there, created new jobs, and helped to prevent the town's extinction.[6]

In exchange for setting up shop in the zone, foreign investors were given benefits like special tax holidays, tariff reductions and grants for research. Companies that accepted these offers, and moved to the zone, included a subsidiary of the De Beers diamond giant as well as Zimmer, which makes medical products including prosthetics and walking frames.

Next to the airport, the Free Zone only covered about one square mile of land – though its influence internationally had been disproportionate. It would inspire a growing number of other countries, companies and international institutions to get involved in similar zones set up around the world.

The middle of the world

The next morning, we drove to the zone. Walking through the gates, we passed large factories and office buildings but found few people to talk to. Most were busy working inside. Nearby, just outside the zone, we found a small convenience store and a café. We went inside for a coffee and met Mary, then 63-years-old, a talkative retired school principal who was sitting with a friend. She nodded vigorously when we asked her if she knew the story of O'Regan and the Free Zone.

Mary, born in Shannon, said it had been an exciting place to grow up. Because of the airport – which, thanks to the zone and the traffic it brought, did not end up closing – 'we thought we were in the middle of the world!' she exclaimed. 'I remember when President Kennedy came through, oh my God, the whole country stopped. Thousands of people went to the airport, it was amazing.' She chuckled. 'It wasn't quite the same when Ronald Reagan came.'

While the airport brought celebrities to Shannon on stop-overs, the zone brought new waves of international visitors, she explained – from corporate executives to government officials studying the development. 'Even at my own school, we would have children from all over the world because their dads or moms were working or doing research in Shannon,' Mary recalled. 'They might just come for a year, they might come for six months, they might come for five years, but we would have people from all over.'

O'Regan's plan to transform Shannon into a hub for foreign investors led to the development of Ireland's first new town in more than 200 years: Shannon Town, built on reclaimed marshland to house factory workers.

Paul Ryan, an economic consultant who grew up in this town, described it to us as 'built from scratch and very much Milton Keynes-esque: the 1960s approach of, "Let's turn it around, make the back of the house the front," all of these green areas, common areas – it was all very much in that style'.

When we visited, Shannon was still tiny, with a population of just 9,673. Though foreign companies did open up shop in the Free Zone, the town's size never truly boomed, as many workers commuted from nearby cities like Limerick, as well as from villages like Sixmilebridge where O'Regan had been born.

By the early twenty-first century, zones like these had spread worldwide, from Argentina to Cambodia. Many had also been set up with advice from Shannon consultants, like Ryan, who worked for Shannon International Development Consultants (SIDC).[7]

He told us that a selling point of these zones was the possibility to test policies in one area, before rolling them out nationwide: 'Let's say you want to try something, in a developing country, and you want to introduce new ways of doing business … having a zone, having an area that is ring-fenced and set aside from the rest of the economy, where you can try new approaches, is part of what makes it work.'

Ryan believed the town stayed small precisely because of its success in attracting foreign investment. 'Shannon grew to a certain point, and then what worked in the free zone could be applied to the rest of the country,' he said. 'The need to have Shannon, this controlled area, went away.' Though, he added: 'Shannon continued to be an excellent brand – even today it is a big name'.

One of the keys to Shannon's success, he stressed, was the development of Smithstown, a nearby industrial estate and satellite location for mainly Irish businesses who became sub-suppliers to larger businesses in the free zone.

'You have to provide the Smithstown, you have to provide that indigenous industry starting point,' he said. Otherwise, local businesses might not benefit.

This made sense, though it was not what we would see on the ground around many other zones – where ensuring that they benefit local industries and communities did not seem to be high on the agenda.

Symbolic Shannon

Since 2005, the Shannon Free Zone had the same 12.5 per cent corporate tax rate as the rest of Ireland. Now most businesses in the zone were in services, not manufacturing. It had become harder to tell what special perks investors received for being in the zone, as those offered in the past had since became national policy and spread across the island.

'The nature of the business has changed and over time the fence that was around the zone, and the custom control points, have disappeared', said Kevin Thompstone, president of the Shannon Chamber of Commerce. We met him in an office at a shopping mall in town, where he showed us a miniature model of Shannon, with tiny replica buildings. The fences, and customs controls, he explained, had been 'originally set up because of the 0 per cent tax rate, that then was extended to other parts of the country'. Over time, he told us, 'the fences came down and the benefits of a free trade zone were no longer so relevant because most of the exports were going to the EU, which was duty-free anyway. Really, today the Shannon Free Trade Zone name that you see on the entrance, is there more for marketing'.

At the airport, in the office of Shannon Group plc, an Irish state-owned company in charge of developing the area, we met strategy director Patrick Edmonds who told us a similar story. 'There is now very little differentiation that we can achieve as a general purpose free zone, so that isn't going to cut it.' For such strategists, this posed the question: 'Ireland is already an attractive location for investors for national-level reasons. So how do we actually differentiate Shannon?'

Until 2004, another state-sponsored company called Shannon Development had been responsible for many town and government services that would otherwise have been provided by local authorities. At that point, such functions were transferred to the local county, though the company retained authority over the free zone itself.[8]

When we arrived in Shannon, the airport still operated regular passenger flights to and from cities like London, New York and Warsaw, as well as some seasonal flights to places like Boston and Frankfurt.

The US military had also used Shannon for stopovers during the first Gulf War. After the 11 September 2001 terrorist attacks, it was used to invade Iraq. In 2007, the Irish Human Rights Commission reviewed evidence suggesting that the airport was also being used for the refuelling of CIA 'extraordinary rendition' flights to secret detention and interrogation sites. One example it looked at was the case of Kuwaiti-born German national Khaled El-Masri, who was flown to Afghanistan and tortured for months (with no evidence ever emerging, or charges made, in relation to any terrorist activities). 'The aircraft involved in his abduction,' said the Commission, 'had stopped in Shannon.'[9]

The airport's military business was particularly controversial because Ireland had remained outside of NATO and had a policy of military neutrality. Throughout the 2000s, protestors targeted US military planes at the airport, while the transit of troops generated significant revenues for Shannon, helping to offset losses from fewer commercial flights. An estimated 2.5 million US troops had passed through here since 2001.[10]

An activist group called Shannonwatch had been campaigning against the use of Shannon airport by the US military on their way to and from wars in the Middle East. On a sunny morning we met Edward Horgan, a long-time activist with this group, who walked with us to the airport's edge. 'That's one right there', he told us, peering through binoculars at a military plane across the runway.

'The bulk of troops would have passed through on chartered civilian aircraft but we do know that those troops are carrying those weapons with them on the planes', Horgan told us, standing by a thin metal fence. Among the planes activists had documented here, he said, was the Lockheed C-130 Hercules military aircraft, which comes in various, including weaponized, versions.

It was striking that, despite its tiny size, Shannon had been touched in many ways by grand currents and global events for generations: from the expansion of international investment and SEZs to US military operations.

We were also struck in Shannon by the role of symbolism. We had heard how its zone was no longer such an exceptional space, given national policy changes, but that maintaining it and its name was useful for 'marketing'. It reminded us of what we had heard before – including in Myanmar where the World Bank's IFC had said that investing in a five-star hotel would send an important 'signal' to foreign investors that they would be comfortable in the country.

As early as the 1960s and 1970s, consultants from Shannon were working on designs for new free zones in Taiwan, Malaysia, Egypt and Sri Lanka. They also organized training courses, attended by representatives from governments around the world, on how to develop these zones.

Jiang Zemin, who later became China's president, visited Shannon as a junior customs official in 1980 and took one of these three-week training courses. At that time, China's leader Deng Xiaoping was starting to experiment with opening up its economy to international capital. The Shenzhen SEZ – China's first – opened the same year that Zemin returned from Shannon.

In 2005, Wen Jiabao, then China's leader, joined a long line of high-level Chinese dignitaries to come and pay their respects to the birthplace of the SEZ model they thank for their country's rise to economic superpower status.

Thompstone, at the Shannon Chamber of Commerce, told us that in the run-up to Wen's visit, the Chinese ambassador had asked their Irish hosts to make time for him to pause for reflection on the 'plateau' – a spot on the town's Tullyglass Hill that overlooked the grey, windswept, industrial zone.

'This was the leader of China, a country with a population of 1.3 billion!' Thompstone exclaimed, pausing at the memory of this incongruous spectacle – the political ruler of this superpower apparently humbled by Shannon, his tiny town in western Ireland. 'To us it was just this nondescript place on the top of a hill, but for the Chinese, they wanted to see where it all started'.

Undoubtedly, Chinese leaders took the SEZ model 'to a much bigger scale than anything that we did', he continued, encouraging us to join him in marvelling at this story. 'The Chinese were able to develop and grow on the back of this model from this little place called Shannon … and there's something in their spirit that says, "You know those people who went before us, where did it start? Where did it come from?"'

Bad jobs

Other 'early SEZs', such as those set up in the Philippines in the 1960s and 1970s, were 'almost like labour camps', Jonathan Bach, a global studies professor at The New School in New York, told us. 'You would bring in the workers, you'd house them in dormitories, you'd sort of use them up and get rid of them and then get new ones. And then if the cost of doing business got too expensive, or too problematic – if there were protests or something – you'd just pack up and move somewhere else.'

Some countries, we learned, gave investors in these zones clear and formal exemptions from national labour laws. In Pakistan, zone workers were forbidden to strike or take other industrial actions. In West Africa, labour inspectors in Togo struggled to even enter these zones. The Nigeria Export Processing Zones Decree promised: 'There shall be no strikes or lockouts for a period of 10 years following the commencement of operations within a zone.'[11]

Even where there weren't such explicit, formal exemptions from labour laws, local authorities seemed to be regularly accused of turning a blind eye to worker's rights violations in these carve-outs.

Protests and rights violations at specific SEZs sometimes made headlines. But journalistic coverage of these spaces seemed very small compared to their scale and the number of people whose lives and livelihoods were affected by them.

Back at the CIJ, we charted the expansion of SEZs around the world. It seemed to happen around the time of the growth of the investor-state legal system, and international aid and development system that we'd investigated.

These zones emerged, at least in their contemporary form, in the same period in the mid-twentieth century as formal colonial regimes were winding down. They had also similarly boomed in the 1990s, at the end of the Cold War.

After the 2008 global financial crisis SEZs proliferated further, with countries from Myanmar to Cuba opening new zones. 'Any country that didn't have [an SEZ] 10 years ago either does now or seems to be planning one', Thomas Farole, an expert on SEZs at the World Bank, boldly told The Economist in 2015.[12]

That year, Djibouti, Mozambique and South Sudan had joined the list of countries with plans for new zones. There were even carve-outs within carve-outs: in 2011, the tax haven Cayman Islands opened up a niche 'tech zone' within its territory. Setting up and managing these spaces had fuelled a whole industry of SEZ consultants, and not only from Ireland. In 2017, Chinese officials said that companies from their country had so far 'set up 99 economic and trade cooperation zones abroad'.[13]

Often these developments came with publicly proclaimed goals to boost economic growth and create huge numbers of new jobs for local workers. But the voices of the many millions of workers that powered these spaces – and the many others who lived and worked in their shadows – were seldom heard.

Gavin encouraged us to find and listen to their stories for ourselves. We planned our next trip with this advice in mind: we would go to Shenzhen in China, the site of that country's first and most famous SEZ, inspired by Shannon, Ireland.

The process for getting a visa for China seemed complicated and uncertain and even intimidating, especially for foreign journalists. But, we learned, the zone had its own, different rules. Visitors could get a special five-day SEZ visa on arrival.

We learned that international business travellers used this visa to visit the zone – but so did some tourists visiting theme parks in what was now a growing mega-city as well as discount shopping near the SEZ's famous factories. And we learned that you could get there by train from Hong Kong, which sits east of the Pearl River estuary, surrounded by the South China Sea on all but its north side, neighbouring Shenzhen.

Hong Kong had been the UK's last major colony, transferred to the People's Republic of China in 1997 under a declaration that promised the island a 'high degree of autonomy' under a 'One Country, Two Systems' principle.[14] The deal was that it would be a 'special administrative region' of China for fifty years. After 2047, it could become fully integrated with the mainland, or fully independent. What would happen then was already the subject of huge debate.

We landed at Hong Kong's international airport, one of the world's busiest, buzzing with business travellers and tourists, amid growing tensions. Democracy and independence movements had swelled, led largely by young people who took to the streets to demand the right to directly elect their leaders.

We had taken a gruelling series of flights from London. Stepping outside, we were hit with suffocating humidity. Our bus from the airport weaved through streets of tall, thin blocks of apartments, offices, hotels and other buildings.

The budget hotel we'd booked had an open door onto the street, and a tiny elevator to its upper floors. Our rooms were minuscule with corners abruptly walled off for small showers and toilets. Tight spaces seemed more like the rule than the exception in Hong Kong, increasingly infamous for 'coffin apartments' or 'cage homes' – just large enough for a single bed, elevated in order to cram everything else underneath.

Like London, this was one of the world's international financial capitals par excellence – packed with skyscrapers, banks and corporate offices. They shared Hong Kong with more than 7 million people, making it one of the world's most densely populated places – as well as unequal and unaffordable for many.

The tallest building was the International Commerce Centre, with more than 100 stories. Above the offices of international banks and corporations, the five-star Ritz-Carlton Hotel and high-class restaurants occupied more than a dozen floors. On the rooftop was the world's highest swimming pool and bar. It was flashy and new – completed in 2010, after construction was temporarily halted the previous year, when a bamboo platform collapsed and six construction workers plunged to their deaths.[15]

Hong Kong had also once been an outpost of the East India Company – the most famous of the 'chartered companies' that helped to occupy and rule captured territories for colonial powers. The UK took direct control after the company began trading opium grown in India for tea from China, which led to a series of armed conflicts in the nineteenth century called the 'Opium Wars'.[16,17] In the twentieth century, Hong Kong developed one of Asia's largest manufacturing economies. Since the 1990s, it had soared as an international financial hub.

We walked to Kowloon, a bustling part of the city in the north by Victoria Harbour, named after the nineteenth-century British Queen. This area was where Edward Snowden had hidden in 2013, after blowing the whistle on mass surveillance practices by the US National Security Agency. First he had stayed in a luxury hotel, and then among asylum-seekers in cramped apartments at Chungking Mansions – a complex of buildings including shops, budget guesthouses and money changers.[18]

But we had come to Hong Kong primarily to leave it. The next day, we met a young woman who we had hired to be our translator. She told us about the questions she and others were asking, about how to make the promise of democracy real. We were fascinated by the role that young people like her had played in the recent protests, and listened carefully to her stories.

She also listened closely to what we told her: about how China's most famous special economic zone, next door, had been inspired by a project in Ireland, and how this model had since spread across the world. Even in our home, London, a new ‘enterprise zone’ was being built (by Chinese developers).

Then she took us around a street corner to buy new SIM cards. ‘These are for Shenzhen. Leave yours here, in your hotel,’ she said. ‘Be careful about what you bring tomorrow – your notes? Leave them here too.’

Chapter 13
Rights suspended

Five days in Shenzhen

The next day, we got on a train to Shenzhen. The carriage had standing room only. It was full of couples and families going in the same direction.

At the other end, we waited in a line with well-heeled tourists and besuited business travellers. Looking around us, the room seemed to be covered with surveillance cameras. We somewhat anxiously completed the required paperwork and waited for a Chinese immigration official to paste SEZ visas into our passports, valid for five days and only within the zone.

Our translator had gone into another line and it was hard to find her afterwards, in a large and busy square by Shenzhen's train station. She seemed nervous.

She had been one of the tens of thousands of young people to join Hong Kong's historic 2014 'umbrella movement' pro-democracy protests which lasted seventy-nine days. She had told us about her first taste of tear gas during these protests, and how their violent repression had shocked her; she now knew that 'stepping out of line' could carry serious risks.

Many people in Hong Kong were also on edge when we arrived because of then-ongoing disappearances of several well-known booksellers.[1] It was widely suspected that they were being held somewhere by Chinese security.

The men had all been affiliated with a popular, independent bookstore on the island that sold political books that were banned in China. One of them, Lam Wing-kee, later said that he had been abducted at the border with Shenzhen, right where we were.[2] But we didn't know this then. We were on-edge because of what we were going to do: meet embattled labour activists in what felt like one of the most heavily surveilled places in the world.

In 2010, Shenzhen's thirtieth birthday was celebrated with fireworks. China's President Hu Jintao called it 'a miracle'.[3] The zone's tens of thousands of factories had produced iPhones, clothes and more for export globally. But it was also now a flashy megacity with a total economic output that rivalled that of entire countries. Overhead, skyscrapers shone at night in flashing, neon colours. We saw familiar logos like KFC, McDonald's and 7-11.

It was again hard not to notice the surveillance cameras everywhere, mounted in plain view on buildings and metal poles. Some rotated. It was easy to feel like we were being followed by someone out of sight. The result was an eerie sensation that big businesses may have been welcomed in, but people were heavily controlled.

In the 2000s, Shenzhen had installed 200,000 closed-circuit cameras in public spaces as a practice run for China's Golden Shield programme, a project to create a vast database that would correlate video feeds with biometric data from cell phones and mandatory, national ID cards. Officially, this system was aimed at fighting crime. But it could also be used to tighten control amid unrest. One local company, Naomi Klein reported in Rolling Stone, had already developed software to let 'cameras alert police when an unusual number of people begin to gather at any given location'.[4]

Despite such high levels of surveillance, there had been a growing number of workers' protests in Shenzhen as well as across China. In Hong Kong, we had met activists at an NGO called the China Labour Bulletin that had been diligently documenting these events. They told us that the number of such protests in the country had grown from more than 1,300 in 2014 to over 2,700 the next year – including more than one a day in Shenzhen and neighbouring Guangdong province.

While some of these protests were about working conditions, others we learned had been prompted by the closure of factories – with workers accusing their bosses of cheating them out of full severance and social insurance payments.

Sometimes protesting workers tried to appeal to the state for help. In July 2015, for example, more than 100 workers at a Shenzhen factory supplying the giant fast-fashion brand Uniqlo had travelled to the capital of Guangdong province to petition local authorities. They said their factory had suddenly announced its closure and was leaving without paying debts to workers. But instead of meeting with them, officials called the police to drag them back to the zone.[5]

Sweatshop city

In January 1979, the then 74-year-old Communist Party leader Deng Xiaoping made a landmark trip to the US amid plans to 'open' China up to foreign investors. As the dignitaries stood at the White House for a nineteen-gun salute, Jonathan Steele at The Guardian noticed: 'A bright red cola delivery van passed by … It was a fitting symbol of the multi-million dollar bonanza which

American businessmen are looking forward to, thanks to China's new appetite for American trade, technology and credits.'[6]

The next year, in 1980 Deng Xiaoping opened the Shenzhen SEZ. In those early days, it was a small zone carved out of an otherwise rural farming and fishing area. To entice foreign investors into this carve-out, the government gave it the power to set its own tax and other business incentives. But it had something else to offer companies: a labour force of millions of rural migrants.

China's hukou system of household registration, introduced in the late 1950s to curb urbanization, severely curtailed these migrants' rights. It tied their access to services, including subsidised healthcare and education, to their place of permanent residency (which was hard to move). Migrant workers could get temporary resident permits, but these linked their status and rights to their employers.

Some factory bosses, we learned from labour rights activists in the area, seemed to have devised additional strategies to further tighten the screws – by requiring workers to pay 'security deposits', for example, or by seizing their identity documents. Many workers also lived in factory housing; in such cases, losing their jobs would also mean losing their homes.

In the 1990s and early 2000s, Shenzhen became almost synonymous with 'sweatshop globalisation', with reports of workers toiling incredibly long hours in unsafe factories to make things like Mickey Mouse books, Teletubbies dolls and Reebok shoes.[7] Wages were not necessarily lower inside the SEZ, but conditions could be dire. Mandatory and unpaid overtime seemed commonplace. Workplace injuries had also scarred many people.

The hukou system had made it harder for workers to fight back. It was partly reformed after the death in custody of a university graduate in the northern Chinese city of Handan, in 2003, who had been arrested for not having his papers in order.[8] But change only went so far. Migrant workers still didn't have equal rights and could still struggle to access services.

Meanwhile, Shenzhen's workers also faced new challenges as the city began to pursue an aggressive agenda of 'upgrading' into tech and finance. The message seemed to be becoming clear for many of them: you're not needed anymore.

The first day of May is celebrated around the world as International Workers' Day, or 'May Day'. Officially, it is one of the most important holidays in China, and Shenzhen is supposed to be a quintessential 'workers city'. But instead of marches and rallies for labour rights, we found that it was a shopping day – focused on consumers, rather than producers. Stores were open, and assistants advertized their wares and sales through megaphones on the crowded streets.

We walked through some of these shopping streets and then took a taxi to spend the day meeting with labour activists and workers who made eyeglasses for export to Europe and the US at a huge factory in the Longgang district. First opened in the late 1980s, this factory was among those closing as the area around it was being 'redeveloped' into new offices and upscale apartments.

One 60-year-old migrant worker from western Guangzhou, who spoke to us on condition of anonymity, said he'd moved to Shenzhen in 1997. Two years later, he was injured at work. 'I was soldering tables and chairs and a spark went into my eye', he recalled. He went to a doctor, and received 'an official certificate, but … the company said, "If you want compensation, you have to resign"'.

We spoke in the small one-room apartment he shared with his son, who also worked at the factory. 'Everybody in this building works there', the father told us, sitting barefoot on the edge of the bed that takes up most of the space.

Now that the factory where they worked was closing, he said that he and many of his co-workers were effectively being forced into retirement. This was Shenzhen 2.0: a financial centre where many migrant workers, having outlived their utility, were now being pushed out of the place they helped to build.

Later that day, we walked through the streets of Longgang with that factory worker's son. 'It's hard to get another job', he told us. 'In this area they are not opening new manufacturing plants. Factories are being replaced by offices.'

Like everywhere else in the city, surveillance cameras were prominently in view on the street, outside the factory, at the intersection, by the bus stop.

'I'm not afraid of the government. I'm fighting for my rights', he stated firmly. But he added that he was likely going to leave Shenzhen himself, and return to western Guangzhou. Life as a migrant worker in this city was becoming increasingly impossible, he explained, and because of this 'many people are leaving'.

In 2015, China was celebrated internationally for having 'lifted out of poverty' almost 750 million people since 1990. 'This is a huge contribution for global poverty alleviation,' said UNICEF.[9] It was the reason why the world met the UN Millennium Development Goal of halving extreme poverty globally.

Other figures also attracted international attention. China's per capita income, for example, increased fivefold between 1990 and 2000, from $200 to $1,000. By 2010, it had reached $5,000 and China moved into the ranks of middle-income countries.[10]

But top-line figures could mask important details. Many of those 'lifted out of poverty' were only barely above the extreme poverty line (which wasn't high – the equivalent of a couple of dollars a day). Inequality rose dramatically.

The workers we met in Shenzhen described how their cost of living had soared in the increasingly flashy metropolis. Whole neighbourhoods where migrant workers lived for decades were being demolished. Many were being left homeless as well as jobless, as many factories moved to other Asian countries, or to inland China provinces, where they could pay lower wages.

Jonathan Bach at The New School told us that this zone's initial purpose had been to experiment with 'ideas about the market and labour and capital, and using those ideas to influence the rest of the country'. Policies pioneered here, including short-term labour contracts and performance-based wages, had since been rolled out nationwide. In the process, Shenzhen's questions changed.

They were no longer, Bach said, 'How do you get as many workers into Shenzhen as you can?' but rather, 'How do you get the low-skilled workers demanding higher wages out?' He argued: 'That's the whole name of the game in the global economy: to play countries off one another. And the idea of the SEZ was sort of to allow countries to have different jurisdictions, even within their own national jurisdictions.'

Union-free dreams

We next flew into Phnom Penh, the capital of Cambodia. This south-east Asian country had also begun championing SEZs, albeit more recently. It seemed to be on the map, along with neighbouring Vietnam, as a destination for factories leaving Shenzhen. A new Special Economic Zone Act was passed in 2005. But unlike similar legislation in other countries, it didn't seem to grant significant tax breaks to foreign investors setting up shop in new zones. So what was it about?

At first, we learned, the Cambodian government tried to exempt companies in these zones from following national labour law. One person with knowledge of the legislation negotiations said the Ministry of Commerce approached lawyers for 'technical advice' asking things like 'well, how can we make the zones union-free?'

Tola Moeun, the executive director of Centre for Alliance of Labour and Human Rights (CENTRAL), a Cambodian worker's rights group, also told us: 'When investors started to think about the economic zones, the government tried to introduce a new law … for the zone, to make it so that the current labour law would not apply in the zone itself'. The initial idea was 'no freedom of association, no freedom for collective bargaining and so on. No right to strike,' Moeun said, although the government eventually 'stepped back from their plan' amid opposition including from unions.

However they would seem to succeed in making it de facto impossible for workers to organize within SEZs, through other means – including by restricting access to these zones and not letting worker's rights groups inside.

When we arrived in the country, recent years' double-digit economic growth rates had triggered a wave of new construction projects in Phnom Penh including new hotels, restaurants and residential high rises. Real estate prices were rapidly increasing. The country had also become a hotspot for new industrial developments. Several special economic zones had been opened; they were home to many factories as well as sites of growing protests.

About an hour's drive west of Phnom Penh, we found one of these zones. Cambodia's first: the Phnom Penh Special Economic Zone (PPSEZ). After crawling along traffic-jammed and dusty roads, we arrived at its imposing front gate. Crossing into it was like entering an alternative version of the country, with pristine tarmacked streets lined by factories.

We ended up visiting this zone twice – first, with a public relations firm that represented it. They drove us in an air-conditioned 4x4 with leather seats, in which we were oblivious to the 40 degree heat outside. This zone was not administered by the government but by a private company, and we had an appointment with Hiroshi Uematsu, the Japanese CEO of the zone, in its management building.

We sat in an air-conditioned office while Uematsu outlined PPSEZ's founding goal to attract manufacturers from wealthier countries, and especially Japan, to open factories. 'In 2007, there were very few Japanese factories in Cambodia, though there were many already in Thailand and Vietnam', he set the scene.

Almost a decade later, the PPSEZ had succeeded in drawing in forty-four Japanese firms – as well as thirty-two companies from thirteen other countries. Yamaha had a factory here, and Coca-Cola was building one. Other names were lesser-known, but were suppliers or subsidiaries of big brands like Timberland, Puma, Apple and Old Navy.

Uematsu told us that he was happy with his work in Cambodia. 'I sometimes face [sic] directly with labour union activities', he explained, but 'in the Philippines I have to be very careful, with smoked glass and security'.

Though Cambodia also seemed to have a militant workforce. At the end of 2013, a national strike brought thousands of workers out onto the streets to demand a minimum wage of $160 a month. At the time, it was nearly half that – $85 monthly. The government eventually increased it to $140 to quell the uprising.[11] While we were talking to Uematsu in the PPSEZ, outside of the National Assembly in Phnom Penh hundreds of protesters clashed with police and two received head wounds after parliament passed a new trade union law that would make it even harder for workers to organize independently.[12]

The second time we went to the PPSEZ, two days later, we travelled in a tuk tuk with a translator from the Coalition of Cambodian Apparel Workers' Democratic Union (CAWDU), one of several, embattled independent labour unions in the country. This time, we had arranged to meet with workers who had previously been dismissed from their jobs at one of the zone's garment factories.

Their only crime, these workers told us, was trying to independently organize. 'It is very difficult if [an] employer knows that I worked for, or was related with the union. It means they will find any way or method to dismiss me', Leng Sophen, a then 29-year-old who had worked in packaging in the factory, told us.

We met in a coffee shop outside the zone's gates. The workers seemed nervous at the site of a burly man who sat down at a nearby table.

After he lost this job, Leng said got one in another factory. But, he explained, 'the first contract is usually a short term contract and when they understood that I was related with the union, they dismissed me when the contract expired'.

Officially, firing workers for organizing is illegal in Cambodia. So is hindering organizing efforts. Several of the multinational companies that sourced products from Cambodian SEZs had adopted corporate codes of conduct explicitly supporting the rights of workers to unionize. We contacted six, receiving responses from only two.

Skechers said it complied with Footwear Distributors and Retailers of America guidelines, which affirmed rights to unionize. But the company would not even confirm or deny whether it manufactured goods in Cambodia's Manhattan SEZ, where we would go next. In its response, Levi Strauss denied that it sourced products from SEZs, although a PPSEZ jeans factory listed Dockers, one of the company's subsidiaries, as among its buyers.

But Leng, other workers and labour activists we interviewed came to the same conclusion: it was even harder for people to organize to protect and advance worker's rights within these zones, compared to outside of them.

Cambodia gained independence from France in the early 1950s – however its history would continue to be affected by foreign powers. The Vietnam War, and US bombing, extended into the country in 1965. In 1970, a military coup ousted Cambodia's king and installed a new right-wing pro-US regime. The Khmer Rouge, led by Pol Pot, then took over and led a genocide – infamous for its 'killing fields'.[13]

The government of Hun Sen, Southeast Asia's longest-serving non-royal leader, had been in power since 1985. Most of Cambodia's labour force was represented by 'yellow unions' linked politically to his ruling party. They were criticised for effectively representing the government and employers, rather than workers. Independent labour activists had meanwhile been beaten, detained or imprisoned on dubious charges, and murdered. In January 2004, Chea Vichea, the founder and leader of the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia and a supporter of the opposition Sam Rainsy Party, was shot and killed while reading a newspaper in the street.[14]

In a 2013 report brazenly entitled 'Where Have All The Poor Gone?' the World Bank celebrated 'tremendous' economic growth in country over the preceding decade, calling it among 'the best in the world', along with dramatic reductions in the number of people living in extreme poverty, from 52 per cent to 21 per cent, 'surpassing all expectations'.[15]

In passing, this report also acknowledged that 'the majority of these people escaped poverty only slightly: they remain highly vulnerable – even to small shocks – which could quickly bring them back into poverty,' as well as the fact that 'human development, particularly in the areas of health and education, remains an important challenge.' But its overall message seemed to be praise for this 'success story'.[16]

Farming had long been a mainstay of the economy with the country exporting large amounts of rice, rubber, soybeans and other crops. Now, textiles and tourism were its greatest sources of hard currency though pay and conditions for workers seemed dire. In 2015 Cambodia ranked among the worst places in the world for organized labour in the International Trade Union Confederation's Global Rights Index, categorized as a country with 'no guarantee of rights'.[17]

Per capita income remained much lower than neighbouring Vietnam and Laos.[18] Human rights groups and the UN had sounded alarms over restrictions on the media, freedom of expression and political participation.[19] Cambodia additionally had one of the world's highest rates of deforestation, including from large-scale clearings for big construction and agricultural projects and from illegal logging in national parks and wildlife sanctuaries threatening endangered species with extinction.[20] Allegations of 'land grabbing' by companies as well as authorities were multiplying.[21]

Cracks in Cambodia

A main opponent of a higher minimum wage in Cambodia was the GMAC garment manufacturers association. In their Phnom Penh offices, we met secretary general Ken Loo, who told us: 'I don't believe in a minimum wage; I believe in market forces.' 'Hardworking workers,' he continued, 'could be earning a lot more, but … they have to subsidise the lazy bums'.

Some of these so-called lazy bums told us a different story. '$140 a month is not enough for us, but we still do it,' said Sokha Khan, a then 36-year-old garment worker who supported her husband and children on her small wage. Other workers said this amount may cover one frugal person's living expenses, but not a family's.

Women made up 95 per cent of Cambodia's SEZ workers – a statistic which also seemed based on harmful gender stereotypes. In 2015, an Asian Development Bank research paper recounted: 'It is said that females possess the nimble fingers and patience with routine tasks required by the labour-intensive processes generally occurring in the zones and that they are also less likely than males to strike or disrupt production in other ways'.[22]

In the capital, we also went to the Cambodian offices of the US organisation the Solidarity Centre, part of the American Federation of Labour and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO). It was the afternoon that the much-criticised trade union law was passed by the government. The heads of independent unions from around the country were composing a joint statement in response. There, we met Ou Tepphallin, vice president of the Cambodian Food and Service Workers' Federation. She also told us organizing in SEZs is > not easy, because the workers stay in the block and there is a barrier between the union representatives, it's not easy to share information [with workers] inside … If we need to coordinate with our members, we need to make an appointment, and if they don't allow us inside, it's not easy for a union leader or activist to go inside to ask or make an appointment about worker issues.

Such obstacles had not stopped workers' protests, however.

We next drove four hours east, across the Mekong River, to the Bavet region on Cambodia's eastern border with Vietnam. This was where the Manhattan SEZ was opened in 2006. It had been an epicentre of militant workers' actions ever since – despite (or because of) the lack of independent unions inside.

Bavet had been among the most bombarded areas under Operation Menu, the secret 1969–1970 campaign in which the US dropped a greater tonnage of bombs on Cambodia than it had on Japan during the whole of the Second World War.[23] Now the area, of lush fields and wide dusty roads, was home to countless casinos as well as three huge SEZs.

Such zones around the world were often established in border towns or near ports, for the convenience of companies' imports and exports. What developed around them was often transient and ad-hoc as a result – with shops and services set up and homes and infrastructure built as quickly as possible. This rushed development and a lack of stability created impersonal atmospheres.

We got through the zone's gates by mentioning the name of its manager, with whom we had been in contact over email. He wasn't there, but it was enough to get us inside, where we found a trail of workers walking silently down a long thoroughfare, some to take their lunch break, others on their way home. All seemed reluctant to speak to us – about their work or unions.

One then 34-year-old garment worker responded to our questions with terse answers. She said she was paid between $140 and $150 a month. When we asked if she was a member of a union, she said she didn't know anything about this and abruptly ended our conversation. Others did similarly.

We had better luck at a cafe outside the zone's gates, where we met five women who worked at the same factory. None of them said they were members of a union either; rather, they said the option of joining a union was never mentioned to them. Instead, they described a 'shop steward' who performed a mediation role, likely on behalf of the factory. 'If there was a union inside the factory, it would be good because we could demand something', said one woman. 'Normally we just come to work, and then we go back home to take care of our husbands and children, that's all.'

Ath Thorn, president of the Cambodian Labour Confederation (CLC), told us that he was not surprised to hear that some workers were not aware of unions. 'In the Bavet economic zones, a few years back there was [a] general strike, and the shooting of three of the workers,' he explained, 'and from that time if we are comparing, now they are really strict, now they do not allow our union to organise over there and when we saying something in the zone they do not allow it, they just block it.'

But making independent organizing impossible seemed to be having some unintended results. 'From time to time, this zone is very interesting', Thorn continued: 'If they want to increase their salary they mobilise without a leader and join together. If they want to do something now they will strike in the whole zone. But when we are not allowed easy access inside, it's not managed there, so violence happens during every protest.'

Something was bubbling under the surface. The government's emphasis on SEZs seemed to be part of a move to neutralize organized labour. But, amid fewer opportunities to organize, and harsh crackdowns, several people we spoke to predicted a potential explosion of frustration in the not-too-distant future. Warehousing workers within these zones wouldn't work forever.

Chapter 14
Private cities

A CEO for your city

Shenzhen was famously China's first SEZ – but it wasn't Asia's. That was the Kandla Special Economic Zone, in India. It opened in 1965, at the height of the Cold War, offering foreign investors favourable tax and customs regimes, and better infrastructure than they could find outside of it.

Krishan Kumar, the SEZ's development commissioner, told us that one of this zone's initial objectives was to generate exports and foreign exchange for the country. He also said that its early success sparked international interest. 'I have heard even Chinese came here in the 1970s and early 80s. And now obviously the Chinese have taken the lead and gone far beyond us.' Walking around the area, however, the weight of this history was not easily felt. It was not ever-present; the zone was marked only by a decaying sign.

Each of the zone's roads was lined with factories and we stopped to peek inside them where we could. Inside the Sharda Metal Industries factory, which made stainless steel kitchen products for European and US markets, we found a dark, very hot space. Workers sweated visibly as they beat metal into shape and polished it on the floor.

By the early 1990s, India had established seven of these zones across the country. By the end of the 2000s, there were more than 500 in various stages of planning, construction and operation. In 2005, parliament passed a new Special Economic Zone Act to oversee the growing number of SEZs in the country. Parties on both the right and left had pushed them as part of their development strategies.

India was meanwhile pioneering another form of corporate carve-outs too: entirely private cities, including Lavasa – the country's first city built and run entirely by a corporation, outside of Mumbai and almost 900 kilometers south of its Kandla zone. Naturally, this was where we decided to go next.

Lavasa was the $30 billion baby of billionaire industrialist Ajit Gulabchand. It said it would draw on principles of New Urbanism – an urban design movement promoting 'walkable' communities. But a company would be in charge. Instead of a mayor, a city manager would be appointed by the board of Lavasa Corporation Limited (LCL).

'The company has sweeping rights over nearly all aspects of the life of the residents', warned Persis Taraporevala, a researcher at the Centre for Policy Research think tank in New Delhi in 2013. It will have 'the right to evict, to tax, to determine the use and design of land, to change the governing body and to change the rules while controlling the rights of people to object to these processes'.[1]

Lavasa's city manager, Mukund Rathi, explained that its quasi-totalitarian governance model should not last forever. 'This private corporation is running this city transiently, eventually this will have to be a democratic city', he told us in his office. 'But not until the city has been developed.'

The NewCities international non-profit organisation said Lavasa would have what was 'distinctly lacking in most current Indian cities', including 'an uninterrupted power supply, high-speed internet, e-governance, drinkable tap water, and a walkable city in which the need for cars is minimal'.[2] But it seemed clear that only a minority of people would be able to benefit.

The least expensive apartments were selling for between $17,000 and $36,000 – while the national minimum wage was just over $2 a day.[3] As the development would also need people to work in its schools and shops, for example, there were plans to build some cheaper homes – however its primary residents would be those they'd serve.

Inside the 'All American Diner', 1950s rock'n'roll played through a tinny speaker, the booths were traditional red and the burgers were suitably oversized. But outside our window were the rolling, verdant Sahayadri mountains of western India.

We were 8,000 miles away from where the 'diner' was born in the late nineteenth century, in the US.[4] Around the same time, the British Raj – direct rule by the British Crown, which took over from the East India Company and lasted until 1947 – was establishing itself here. Among its signature institutions were 'hill station' resorts for colonial officials tired of the mad hustle and bustle of Indian cities to escape for breaks.[5]

Since India's independence in 1948, no new hill stations had been established – until Lavasa. When fully built, the development intended to consume 100 square kilometers and have a total population of up to 300,000 in five 'towns' built on the hills. After numerous delays, it said its construction would be done within twenty years, but it still sounded ambitious. Concrete innards and steel girders of unfinished buildings were all around us.

The biggest building in the development by then was the Lavasa International Convention Centre, managed by the hospitality multinational Accor Hotels and meant to be a major draw for international events. It was closed when we were there, with construction stalled around it and the skeleton of a new apartment building behind it.

A Town and Country Club was also almost empty. There, we met guest relations manager Jenny Peiray. Originally from the state of Manipur in the extreme east of India, she told us that she got around 13,800 rupees ($185) a month for six days of work a week. On her day off, 'I clean up my room, I wash my clothes, and I go to the shop to buy some groceries, and I prepare my lunch and dinner'. In a 'city' with far more weekend visitors than full-time residents, she explained: 'My colleagues are my friends. I don't have a boyfriend … Most people are single'.

Portofino Street – named after the elite resort town on the Italian Riviera – followed the edge of a man-made lake. By the waterfront, we found a grand glass-fronted building housing the Lavasa Information Centre. It was empty of people but full of upbeat corporate-speak. A small mounted TV offered a touch-screen presentation. 'Driven by an obsession with its customers', it said, Lavasa allows them to 'Live, Learn, Work, and Play in harmony with nature'. Behind an unmanned front desk was Lavasa's logo, a clipart-style human transforming into a clipart-style flying bird.

Climbing up to the fourth floor of this building, we found a series of rooms that seemed to have been left to decay, full of boxes and unpainted walls from which electrical fittings hung loose, wires across the floor. In some places, the ceiling had huge damp marks across it. Like much of the development, scratching the surface, it looked hollow underneath. Even the name Lavasa was the invention of a US branding firm – meant to sound somewhat Hindi, poetic and mysterious, but having no meaning.

Outside again, we met Dhaval and Vidhi Shah, who were just leaving to go home after coming to Lavasa for a night. 'In Mumbai it's very hot, but you can relax here,' said Dhaval, an engineer. 'We found out about Lavasa from our friends and relatives. They said the climate is very good, and everything is planned and works. Nothing in India is planned; this city is more planned, it's more efficient and clean.'

'But it doesn't solve the problems of Indian cities,' Vidhi chimed in. 'It's a very expensive city because it's totally planned,' she told us, concluding that Lavasa seemed 'more a holiday place for most people, a weekend place. The facilities are not great … it's just a hill station, so for living over here it's not that suitable.'

Clean air for sale

We next landed in Hanoi, Vietnam – which celebrated its 1000th birthday in 2010 – to explore how private enclaves were also shaping this ancient city. In its busy Old Town we zigzagged through scooters that flooded knotted, narrow streets. Above hung clothes drying from balconies and messes of electrical wires.

After sunset, lights came on and shops stayed open. People gathered at small cafes, sitting on very low stools. Streets still bore the names of trades that had long clustered there, like Hang Bo (baskets). On corners, elderly women burned fake bank notes in rituals honouring ancestors.

This area's energy was what had put the city on the map for many international tourists. But it was also, we learned, what had made many elites retreat. A growing number of sometimes giant gated communities had been built around Hanoi. Enormous master-planned developments were taking over farms and rice fields. Former collective housing blocks were being replaced by private complexes.

These developments were inelegantly and very clearly separating the wealthy with high walls and 24-hour private security from street hawkers, congestion and pollution. We were struck by how many of them seemed to specifically advertise cleaner air and environments within their walls, promising green oases for the few that could afford to live there.

In northwest Hanoi, we found one of these developments: the multi-billion dollar Ciputra International City complex, which marketed itself as a 'peaceful oasis among the hustle and bustle of Hanoi'.[6] Surrounded by walls, it covered 3 square kilometers of former farmland. Inside, beige villas were set amid lush gardens with monthly rents as high as £3,000. Under construction were a mega-shopping mall and a private hospital. Wide, quiet roads were flanked by parked, luxury cars, palm trees and statues of Greek gods. The only sound of life was that of children playing at a private school.

Built in the early 2000s to house up to 50,000 people, Ciputra was Hanoi's first 'integrated new town development', and the first overseas project of the Ciputra Group, an Indonesian conglomerate that specialises in large-scale property developments. It seemed designed so that residents would rarely need to interact with the wider world.

Outside the development's gates, we met Lam, then 40-years-old, who described how he'd grown up in the area which was once covered by fields of rice and cherry blossoms, kumquat and peach trees. Now he had a small business selling custom-made picture frames out of a shop-front carved out of his house. Only occasionally, he explained, did he get business from Ciputra residents as 'rich people and foreigners will go to big, fancy shopping malls. We are nearby but not many people come here'.

'Before, most people were poor. Now it's different', this man said, about how Hanoi has become more noticeably unequal. 'I have enough to live on, so I don't really think about it much. But some people are so rich, and some are so poor.'

'This side is just ordinary people. Over there, they are rich', added Mien, then 59-years-old, who like Lam ran a small business out of her home selling tea, cigarettes and bottles of water and soda. A handful of small plastic stools were scattered on the pavement in front of her one-room house across the street from Ciputra. Between customers she lounged on a wire bed frame with no mattress. 'Over here we have just enough to live on', she said.

Across the city, work was under way at another enclave: the $8 billion Ecopark, on the eastern edge of Hanoi.[7] It promised 'perfect harmony of humans and nature' with planned green spaces, a purpose-built 'old town' and a golf course. Its first phase, named Palm Springs after the California desert resort city, had just been completed.

Unlike foreign-built Ciputra, this enclave was being developed by a joint venture of Vietnamese property companies. Though they were also working to attract foreign investors, and residents – including the British University Vietnam, which was building a $70 million campus on the site that would award degrees from the University of London.[8]

On a weekday afternoon, we found the development quiet with many more guards on the streets than pedestrians. Beyond the swimming pool, a shop – without any customers – had a floor lamp in the window on sale for the equivalent of £1,200.

For most Vietnamese, Ecopark was far from a realistic housing option – and its development had been marred by repeated protests from local communities. In 2006, construction was temporarily suspended amid such protests.[9] They erupted again in 2009 and in 2012, when police fired teargas into crowds of local villagers. Several protesters were arrested and journalists were also reportedly beaten by the police.[10]

Outside Ecopark's gates, we met villagers who told us that thousands had been displaced by the development – forced to give up their land, with many former farmers now unemployed and in debt as a result of losing their livelihoods.

Phu was one of them. The octogenarian former rice farmer said his family didn't receive enough compensation for the loss of their land to the enclave and that they were now without work. 'People didn't want to sell the land because farmers have to have land, just like factory workers need factories', he told us. 'Now that we've lost the land, what should we do?' At 83-years-old, he said he was too old to change careers. 'There's nothing I can do now.'

Across Vietnam, the percentage of people living in extreme poverty had fallen from nearly 60 to just over 20 per cent in the previous twenty years.[11] Inequality had also soared and the number of super-rich (with assets over $30 million) more than tripled in ten years.[12] Wealth gaps were large nationwide but were particularly noticeable in cities.

Danielle Labbé, at the University of Montreal, estimated there were about thirty-five 'new urban areas' already completed in Hanoi, with as many as 200 more in the pipeline. She told us that this development boom was spurred by two key pieces of legislation: a new land law in 2003, and a decree in 2007 that transferred power to redevelop land to local authorities (previously, such decisions had to be taken by the prime minister). Afterwards, Vietnam also loosened long-standing restrictions on foreign ownership of companies and property in the country – further fuelling these trends.

This development boom had triggered 'protests, everywhere in the country, in the last few years,' Labbé told us. People who were being displaced 'know how much their land is worth,' and how without it they will have 'very few opportunities'.

'They don't get jobs in these projects', she continued, which 'are not planned to generate very much employment besides domestic services, working as maids, which is not what most villagers are hoping for themselves or their children'.

Private futures worldwide

From east Asia, we next travelled to the southeast of the US – to Florida, which had also become something of a laboratory for ambitious, and sometimes surreal, mega-developments. They included Celebration, an unusual town developed by the Walt Disney Company near its theme park resort. For years, Disney had remained the owner of its downtown area and golf course, though these had since been sold off (to private investors).[13] What remained was a bizarre, life-size model of a 'perfect' small American town.

Alongside perfectly paved roads we found leafy trees and buildings painted in soft colours: lavender, cotton white and light yellow. Elevator music played from speakers mounted throughout the town centre. Across a man-made lake was an art-deco style cinema. A large wooden sign, standing amid carefully manicured bushes with yellow flowers, marked the entrance of a lakeside park but specified: 'Celebration residents ID required. Park areas close at dusk'.

One of the busier shops along the town's few central streets was a bakery serving upscale dog treats. At a nearby bar, the back of the menu explained that Celebration's first residents moved in on 18 June 1996, after a 'lottery' the previous year. It now had 8,502 residents with an average household income of $92,000 and a median home cost of $543,800.

After about an hour's drive from Celebration, we found something else: the site of a proposed, brand-new 'fully functioning city' that by 2080 could house as many 500,000 people. It was controversial because of its expected impact on the environment – and the secrecy of the business behind it.

This development's plan included 'a variety of centres and neighbourhoods' with a total 'footprint of around one square mile – equal to [that] of downtown Orlando'.[14] Office blocks, high-rise hotels and apartment buildings were among the structures anticipated, along with new schools, a hospital, parks, a university, new motorways and rail lines.

The location was Deseret Ranch: part of the vast property empire of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which had become one of the biggest landowners in Florida. The ranch had already expanded almost six-fold to occupy more than 1,100 square kilometers. It reportedly sold cows to Cargill, and oranges to Tropicana, as well as renting land to hunters and other companies. Though Deseret declined to confirm details of how its land was used.

It said: 'As a private investment affiliate of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Deseret Ranch does not release financial information or details about our production and customers.' A church's press office also wouldn't answer our questions.

Ryan Cragun, an associate professor of sociology at the University of Tampa, told us this tight-lipped approach wasn't surprising. He'd previously worked with Reuters to estimate that the Mormon church owned properties worth $35 billion.[15] 'Their finances are a black box', he told us, adding that the church stopped releasing annual financial information to its own members years ago. 'Estimating their total land holdings? Good luck … Nobody knows how much money the church actually has.'

On an overcast weekday afternoon, we joined a tour of the ranch led by Mormon missionaries. Fields, orange trees and grazing animals stretched as far as we could see. We learned that it was home to a jaw-dropping 40,000 cows.

The next day, we met Jenny Welch, then 54-years-old, a registered nurse and environmental activist who lived in the area. 'Until this happened the ranch was a quiet neighbour,' she said. 'When I first moved here in 1980, I thought it was great because it would never be developed. This is such environmentally important land.'

'We fought it and fought it and fought it,' added Karina Veaudry, a landscape architect and member of the Florida Native Plant Society, describing it as a 'David and Goliath' struggle. 'This is not a typical housing development. It is an entire region of the state of Florida – and it is the last remaining wilderness', Veaudry stressed. The plan was on an unprecedented scale, and 'impacts the entire state, ecologically'.

Concerns about Deseret's plan included how much water it would consume, the impact of proposed new roads and the amount of land set aside for conservation. Veaudry said environmental groups had tried to engage with the plans from the beginning by raising concerns but also suggesting enhanced measures to protect local ecosystems. But, she said, what was ultimately approved was 'pretty much the nail in the coffin' for decades-long efforts to establish a north-south wildlife corridor.

It would put 'literally a city right in the middle of it', she said.

The development wouldn't be built quickly, and more approvals would be needed on specific details. This did not reassure Veaudry, however. 'The main guidelines, the amount of conservation, how wide the buffers have to be, all of that is already approved and set … as I understand it, the damage is done.'

More than 2,000 kilometers north, in Vermont we met local residents fighting another epic city-building plan near the birthplace of the founder of the Mormon church, Joseph Smith. This time, rather than the church there was a Utah businessman behind the project, who had made his money in big energy, selling sophisticated drilling tools to the oil and gas industry.

As soon as we entered the area around South Royalton – a picturesque New England village that had been captured on film and shown off to millions in the opening sequence of the popular TV series Gilmore Girls – we saw the signs of their protests. 'Together we can stop NewVistas': these words seemed to be everywhere: on stickers on telephone poles; posters on bulletin boards; and on large signs planted in the grass.

NewVistas was the name of the businessman's project to build several new master-planned towns in the area, inspired by notes written by Smith in the early nineteenth century.[16] It was also pitched, however, as a futuristic development that would offer a new 'urban model and economic system for the twenty first century'. Detailed plans included specific designs for three-storey 'standard buildings' with apartments, businesses and some farming and manufacturing all located in one place – and internal walls and floors that could be moved by robotic systems, so that people could live in small, easily rearranged spaces. 'Walkway-podway' systems (elevated sidewalks and underground tubes) would transport people and goods. New toilets would monitor users' health.

Each complete 'NewVista' would have as many as one million people living in fifty community units, each with a population of 15,000 to 25,000. They would be 'organised according to a private capitalistic economic structure. The community is not a political entity but a productive enterprise, like a company town', the project's website explained. A corporation would control things like 'land use, transportation, and community environment, which are usually matters of government concern'.[17]

'NewVistas is my own modern interpretation of Joseph Smith's community documents', David Hall, the businessman behind it, told us over the phone from Provo, Utah, acknowledging that his plans had been controversial.

To make them a reality, he had been buying land in rural Vermont – lots of it. By the time we arrived in the area, the NewVistas project was thought to have already purchased as many as 1,500 acres of land – with plans to buy much more.

We knew this because of the careful eye and research of a young librarian, Nicole Antal, who'd uncovered a series of local land purchases and traced them back to Hall and his NewVistas plans. We met her in the evening at a pub where she explained that she'd first found it all hard to believe – particularly the scale. 'This is very big for Vermont … This is not one guy buying a house and trying something new', adding: 'I don't like that this is being imposed on us', she said. Many others would echo this.

'It hit us like a ton of bricks', said another concerned local resident Jane Huppe, then 58-years-old, of Hall's 'top-down' plans which she feared could completely overwhelm existing communities.

'We didn't waste any time when this came up,' added Michael Sacca, sitting on the porch outside the house that he and his wife had built themselves fifteen years earlier. 'We want to protect our future … maintain our lifestyle and our communities.'

Sacca was director of the Alliance for Vermont Communities, a new group formed by residents in opposition to Hall's plans – and any other similar large-scale developments in the future.[18] He told us these plans simply didn't fit with local priorities for how the area should develop, which aimed to 'concentrate development as much as possible in village centres, town centres, leaving rural areas for rural life'.

He also criticised NewVistas' envisaged corporate structure as an 'Orwellian' experiment designed to 'stand on its own as an insulated corporate town'.

The Mormon church actually seemed displeased with Hall's initiative too. In 2016, a spokesman said: 'This is a private venture and is not associated with The Church … However, for a variety of reasons, we are not in favour of the proposal.'[19]

The businessman didn't seem too concerned about such criticisms and opposition. He was going to continue with what he saw as step one: 'consolidate land'. Though his tune would later change, and by 2018 he reportedly said he was "tired of the drama."[20] By 2021 he had abandoned the project, and the area, having re-sold the land he'd acquired.[21]

Carving out London too

Back at home in London, we went to the Royal Docks Enterprise Zone. It was a more than billion dollar project that would redevelop an area along the River Thames. It was to be the city's first 'enterprise zone' – a carve-out not unlike those we'd seen around the world, from Ireland to China, intended to 'incentivise' private investment.

More than a hundred years earlier, British industry and trade had flourished in this place. The Royal Albert Dock here had been built in 1880 to meet the maritime infrastructure demands of the British Empire amid booming trade with its colonies. But as the UK's naval supremacy slipped into post-imperial decline, the dock and its surroundings fell into disrepair.

In 2013, Chinese developer Advanced Business Park (ABP) acquired sole ownership of the 35-acre estate from the Greater London Authority. It was then joined by China Minsheng Investment Corp, the country's largest private investment firm. 'It will be the international platform and foundation for Chinese companies and capital to enter the European market', Minsheng's president said.[22]

Driving up to the site we saw a flashy glass-walled building, housing the ABP's office, behind fences and signs instructing pedestrians that 'unauthorized persons will be prosecuted'. Inside, we found on display a book of 'The Most Beautiful Chinese Classical Paintings' – and a model of what the redeveloped port would look like. A guard instructed us to put away our cameras.

Both Newham Council, where the zone was located, and what was called the London Enterprise Secretariat had been accused of failing to engage local people in the process of greenlighting this zone. Neither responded to our questions.

This project was also one of a new species of urban space – sometimes called 'POPS' or 'privately-owned public spaces'. These spaces were still open to the public – but were now governed by private owners. This had led to new restrictions on public gatherings and photography, for example.

A fightback had begun, including a campaign called Take Back the City and 'mass trespass' protests. 'The Royal Docks Enterprise Zone is the wrong model for London', the Green Party's Sian Berry told us. 'We're a hugely successful city with many advantages for companies looking to locate here. We shouldn't be giving public land, tax breaks and other generous inducements to large corporations.' She continued: 'I'd like to see the new Mayor renegotiate the deal to ensure fair taxes, a decent amount of social housing and genuinely public space managed by the local authority'.

Incentives offered to investors echoed those in many Asian SEZs, including tax relief, enhanced capital allowances and a convenient 'one stop shop' for regulatory matters. Promotional literature from the Mayor's Office said the area was 'competing for inward investment with locations across London and beyond. Marketing a range of incentives to attract investors and secure occupiers is essential'.

Years later, in 2022 The Guardian would report that, despite its grand ambitions, work had ceased at the site and the scheme appeared on the brink of collapse. The Greater London Authority (GLA) said that a 'final termination notice' had been served on the developer because of delays. Unmesh Desai, a Labour London Assembly member who represents east London, said: 'This was meant to be a jewel in the crown for east London, and it's now a ghost town. It's bitterly disappointing.'[23]

Chapter 15
Finance is king

A fiscal paradise

Mauritius, the tiny island in the middle of the Indian Ocean, was once predicted to be poor forever. Lacking exploitable natural resources like oil or minerals, ahead of its independence from the UK in 1968, the later Nobel prize-winning economist James Meade concluded that its development prospects were essentially nil.[1] Located 1,200 miles off of southern Africa's eastern coast, it was far from other countries and markets, and its economy was essentially dependent on the export of one thing: sugarcane, first introduced by the Dutch East India Company (another of those chartered companies that helped to expand and secure empires) in the seventeenth century, and grown by slaves.

The UN opened an office in the country, in its capital Port Louis, shortly after its independence. At that time, 'economists basically said there's no way Mauritius can survive as an independent nation state', Simon Springett, the UN's resident coordinator on the island, told us about fifty years later. 'Basically, it was trying to figure out how you take a mono-crop economy and diversify it.'

We met him in this office not far from the city's waterfront, where streets with poorly paved roads alternated with other fresh ones lined with the shiny glass of new and well-kept office buildings. There, we found numerous boutique investment firms and financial services businesses catering to the world's elite sitting above restaurants and cafes serving gourmet salads and freshly made smoothies. Their ubiquity reflected what happened next in Mauritius's history – the island's transformation into a tax haven.

Mauritius now had booming tourism and financial service industries. It was known, especially among the international elite, for its white coral beaches, luxury honeymoon packages – and extremely low taxes and high levels of financial secrecy. In 2017 it received 1.3 million tourists – more than its 1.2 million residents.[2] Its offshore financial industry meanwhile had more than 21,000 registered businesses.[3] Though these did not take up a lot of space; many seemed to exist only on paper, apparently set up to benefit from the country's cut-rate taxes and its 'ask-no-questions' attitude.

Development economists marvelled at Mauritius's statistics. GDP per capita on the island rose from less than $2,000 in the early 1980s to $9,600 in 2016, higher than that of Russia, or Brazil.[4] Life expectancy also increased while child mortality fell, and home ownership stood at an extraordinary almost 90 per cent.[5]

The 'Mauritian miracle', as it was sometimes called, seemed like something of an economic development fairytale. The island had indeed reinvented itself – but it had done so by joining a controversial international web of secretive jurisdictions where corporations and elites can stash their cash and limit their taxes and contribution to the infrastructure of public life, from roads to hospitals. We wanted to know more about how this had happened.

The 1992 Mauritius Offshore Business Activities Act, we learned, created a system of 'global business companies' which let non-Mauritians open businesses quickly and without having to disclose much information to authorities, let alone the public. Around this time, the country also cut its tax rates and signed a series of what are called 'international tax treaties' with other countries. Since then, its offshore industry had boomed.

By 2015, global businesses in Mauritius had assets worth more than $630 billion – fifty times larger than the country's GDP.[6] Much of this offshore industry's initial growth was tied to a single tax treaty signed with India, which exempted Mauritian legal residents investing in India from capital gains tax, among other incentives, and made the island an attractive base for wealthy Indians and Indian corporations.

India finished re-negotiating this treaty with Mauritius in 2016 – following years of debate about its costs – doing away with the capital gains tax exemption. But these changes didn't seem to apply retrospectively to corporate structures already established.[7]

Mauritius was meanwhile increasingly appealing to multinational companies investing in Sub-Saharan Africa, marketing itself as a 'gateway' into the continent, as well as pitching for a greater share of the global wealth management business, including by making it easier for ultra-rich foreigners to buy property and become residents on the island.

By 2017, almost 60 per cent of investments by global business companies registered in Mauritius were destined for Africa, according to the African Business Review.[8] Vishnu Lutchmeenaraidoo, then Mauritius's minister of foreign affairs, regional integration and international trade, told a press conference: 'Africa is the name of the game now'.[9]

Mauritius also joined major African trade blocs, including the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (COMESA), and was increasingly marketing itself as an alternative venue to Washington DC for international arbitration cases between foreign investors and states: effectively, it seemed, offering a full-service shop for international capital.

On the other side of this industry's expansion, Mauritius had been accused by some other African governments and civil society groups of facilitating mass draining of public resources from poorer countries by enabling multinational investors to shift their profits and avoid paying their fair share of tax on the continent. Companies didn't even need to have a real physical presence on the island to reap its benefits: this could also be outsourced to firms whose employees might act as representatives for many companies at a time.

At the centre of this industry was its so-called global business system, whereby offshore companies could be set up with low rates of tax and disclosure. They were used to channel investment into other countries, receive profits and hold assets.

Along with India, Mauritius had signed tax treaties with the governments of more than forty countries, around a third of which were in Africa.[10] They were supposed to prevent companies from being taxed twice. But an international web of these agreements led to what was called 'treaty-shopping' – where companies were structured to take advantage of the best provisions on offer to them, to pay as little as possible.

The island became famous for facilitating 'round-tripping' – where companies take money offshore and then bring it back into a country disguised as 'foreign investment', possibly getting tax breaks twice. From 2000 to 2015, 34 per cent of total investment in India came from Mauritius, much of which was believed to be 'round-tripped'.[11]

Another tactic that companies registered on the island could use to lower their tax bills was called 'transfer pricing' – when a tax haven-based parent company, for example, charges its subsidiary in another country artificially high prices for the supply of goods or services. These transactions might exist only on paper, serving to move money from a higher to a lower or zero tax jurisdiction.[12]

The UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) said that illicit financial flows from Africa could be worth as much as $50 billion a year – double the amount of international aid budgeted for the continent – with serious, negative development impacts including drained foreign exchange reserves and worsening poverty. Tax havens had enabled this, it said, by allowing for the creation of 'disguised corporations, shell companies, anonymous trust accounts, and fake charitable foundations'.[13]

The secrecy afforded to companies in places like Mauritius could enable illegal practices – as well as legal but aggressive tax avoidance on a vast scale, with companies declaring their profits not where their real business was, but where they'd pay less. It seemed to be, in turn, part of the larger story about how countries had been pushed into competing with each other in a 'race to the bottom'.

Even the IMF had recognised this. It said that developing countries' revenue losses from practices like 'profit shifting' might exceed $200 billion a year.[14] The issue had also been acknowledged at the very top of the World Bank. In 2015, its then-president, Jim Kim, warned: 'Some companies use elaborate strategies to not pay taxes in countries in which they work, a form of corruption that hurts the poor. More equitable taxation could easily eclipse official development assistance'.[15]

Island of inequality

Abax, one of the bigger corporate management firms in Mauritius, had been spun off from the global accounting giant PriceWaterhouseCoopers a little over a decade before we arrived at its offices in a shiny suburb of the Port Louis capital. Called Ebene – ebony in French – the area was home to towering glass buildings, built on former sugarcane fields, housing numerous law, accountancy and financial services firms.

Abax partner Nousrath Bhugeloo dismissed criticisms of Mauritius as a tax haven and said that companies expanding in Africa might register on the island because of its political stability and 'ease of doing business', rather than desires to pay less tax. She framed the island's role almost in terms of solidarity with the continent, saying that her firm hoped to increase overall investment flows. 'There is so much need for capital in Africa', she told us. 'The biggest issue is the perception of risk.'

'Mauritius doesn't want to tax these people', she continued. 'We believe if an investor comes in and they take the risk to invest, then when he exits he should benefit from it.' With corporate taxes so low in so many places globally, Bhugeloo added, 'if Mauritius wants to be a hub for Africa, it wouldn't be reasonable to say I will tax you 30 per cent to 40 per cent, because no one would come'. Mauritius also benefits from the money that flows through it 'because it creates employment for us', she added, describing it as the goal of many youngsters to join the offshore financial industry that she worked in.

The number of millionaires based on the island was soaring – there were already 3,800.[16] More were expected to make Mauritius their home, at least part-time. The government's 2017 budget also granted non-citizens five-year tax holidays if they invested $25 million in Mauritius – a measure to attract international 'ultra high net worth' individuals and families to 'manage their wealth' from the island.[17] New businesses had opened to house, feed and entertain such elites.

Airlines, hotels and restaurants were also benefiting from the steady stream of executives coming for board meetings. But the offshore industry employed a surprisingly small fraction of the population. Estimates ranged but suggested it involved between 5,000 and 17,500 people directly or indirectly.[18]

In 2018, the World Bank would warn in a 147-page report that inequality among Mauritians had 'widened substantially' over the last fifteen years, 'threatening the living standards of the poor.'[19] The island's boom had produced 'limited shared prosperity and increased inequality', it would concede, with the gap between incomes of the poorest and the richest 10 per cent of households increasing by almost 40 per cent since 2001. Women especially had not benefited, it'd add, with fewer than two thirds in the labour force at all, and those in the private sector paid on average 30 per cent less than men.[20]

At the World Bank's office in Port Louis, Alex Steinart, its Mauritius country representative, repeated what we heard from people in the industry: that it encourages kids to stay in school and work hard to get office jobs.

It's 'pretty important for the way kids perceive things', he argued, 'where you can sort of see your path, that … there's a good job for me, an office job, on the island.' However, he acknowledged: 'You do hear some concerns, that a lot of these are actually not massively high-skilled jobs … the paperwork around registering a company and then just regular annual reporting, or basic accounting functions associated with that'.

'There's no question that the tax appeal of Mauritius is an important part of the story', he continued. But he cited 'an international trend … clamping down on that. That's an increasingly less sustainable way to go'. It would be better for the country to become 'a conduit for international companies to come into Africa perhaps for the first time, facilitating new activity that wouldn't otherwise exist … then you're in win-win territory', he told us, but 'that's not to say it's going to be an easy transition'.

Meanwhile in an interview with the Financial Times, Prime Minister Pravind Jugnauth had recently revived an old narrative, echoing the Nobel prize-winning economist James Meade's dismal 1960s appraisal of the country's prospects 'We are a small island that is limited in many ways. We don't have any natural resources', he said. 'We need to have an edge over others to be attractive', and 'I think the advantage in taxation is important'.[21]

Mauritius mailboxes

This tiny island seemed to bring together several of the themes we had been following so far. It was branching into the business of registering cases through the investor-state legal system; it had effectively given over its territory to international finance, joining the global web of tax havens; and, we'd learned, some companies registered here had help from the development industry too.

Neither the Bank's 2018 report, nor its representative Steinart, had anything to say about investments its International Finance Corporation (IFC) had made in companies registered on the island. In our research, however, we'd found numerous examples of these deals.

Malawi Mangoes, founded by a pair of British entrepreneurs, was one such company. The IFC said its farms in the Salima district in Malawi – one of Southern Africa's poorest countries – made mango and banana not-from-concentrate puree and fresh fruit for export across Africa, the Middle East and Europe.[22]

In 2014, the IFC approved a $5 million investment to support this business's expansion, saying it would create needed rural jobs, 'injecting money to the local economy through wages and benefits paid' and producing 'a strong demonstration effect for promoting further private sector agricultural investment'.[23]

In the IFC's online database of its investments, its deal with Malawi Mangoes was recorded as project number 34816, an agribusiness project in the specific sector: 'soft drink.'[24] Its location was listed as Malawi. But the company receiving the investment was in Mauritius. While the company's products were made in the southern African country, 'via its wholly-owned Malawian subsidiary', the IFC's money would go to 'Malawi Mangoes (Mauritius) Limited'.

The IFC's disclosure said Malawi Mangoes was majority-owned by BXR Group, a private investment group in Amsterdam, and that the second largest shareholder was 'well-known fund manager and philanthropist' Stewart Newton.[25] Its environmental and social review summary said Malawi Mangoes (Mauritius) Limited was 'a holding company that runs an operation in Malawi'.[26] But no explanation was provided as to why the company was structured like this, or why the entity receiving IFC money would be based in a known tax haven.

In Mauritius, company records listed two businesses: Malawi Mangoes (Mauritius) Limited, incorporated in April 2012; and Malawi Mangoes Management (Mauritius) Limited set up in January 2013. Both were offshore companies within the island's global business system, and registered to the same address: 'St Louis Business Centre, CNR Desroches & St Louis Streets, Port Louis'.

After the World Bank's country representative couldn't answer our questions about the IFC's investment, this is where we went – to learn why it was running its operation in Malawi from this tiny island.

It took us a while to find the building where Malawi Mangoes was registered. But we soon learned that it was just a 'care-of' address, at the offices of a financial services firm called Rogers Capital, which helps clients set up and manage offshore entities, lends them its address and keeps their details under wraps.

The security guard at the relatively modest office block not far from the waterfront was not sure if we were in the right place. The women at the front desk at Rogers Capital also seemed bewildered by our simple questions: 'Can we speak to someone about Malawi Mangoes? Are we at the right address?'

We sat in a small waiting room with flat-screen televisions on the walls and flipped idly through glossy magazines fanned out on a glass coffee table which had titles like Savile Row and Family Business. After about 20 minutes, another woman appeared, bearing apologies – she had been out to lunch. At first, she seemed to have mistaken us for Malawi Mangoes' investors. We jumped in to clarify: We're journalists, and wanted to talk to someone from the company, which had received money from a branch of the World Bank.[27] She seemed to know little about the business, or why we might be interested in it. She confirmed that Malawi Mangoes was indeed registered at this address, but would tell us nothing else. There was no one else we could speak to, no one we could interview, not even any pamphlets or brochures we could read.

We found dozens of other IFC investments in companies registered in Mauritius, while operating elsewhere. Most seemed to be focused on sub-Saharan Africa. And in Port Louis, we had more Kafkaesque experiences. On a narrow road with uneven pavement, we found the registered office of CSquared, a broadband internet business operating in countries including Ghana and Uganda, that was first set up in part by Google.[28] It had also received IFC finance. There, the man we spoke to would not even confirm the address of the building we were sitting in.

At other offices of private equity funds the IFC had invested in, we found rooms with wood panelling and maps of tax havens on the walls; a skeleton of a dodo bird behind glass; and sheets of water flowing from a modernist fountain. Young men and women in crisp suits rushed us out of lobbies and meeting rooms.

'Tax evasion is unacceptable in any part of a transaction in which the World Bank Group is involved', the IFC said online.[29] It claimed it 'exercises due diligence to confirm that the structures in which it invests are chosen for legitimate reasons' and that it was 'committed to advancing the international tax transparency agenda'.

This sounded serious, but this language seemed to carefully limit the problem to illegal activity. Tax evasion is the illegal non-payment or underpayment of tax. But multinational companies had many strategies to limit tax bills. Some might be legal but still highly questionable – particularly for the IFC, a public institution, backed by the world's governments and specifically mandated to end poverty and boost 'shared prosperity'.

Some NGOs had argued for years that the IFC shouldn't be investing in companies using tax havens at all, as such structures enable information on money made and taxes paid to be hidden from governments and the public.[30]

Oxfam had accused the World Bank of 'turning a blind eye' to the use of tax havens in IFC investments. It also looked at its disclosures and found that 25 per cent of investments in sub-Saharan Africa one year went to companies incorporated in tax havens including Mauritius (almost 9 per cent), Netherlands or Jersey. It further found that a majority of IFC investees used tax havens, apparently unconnected to their core business, at some point in their structures. It demanded that the World Bank 'prove that its companies are paying their fair share of tax' and ensure that these businesses aren't taking 'advantage of the weakness of the system to reduce their tax bill'.[31]

At the time, an IFC spokesperson responded by inaccurately characterizing Oxfam's criticisms as focused on illegal tax evasion, stressing that 'there are legitimate uses for offshore structures' (without explaining what these are). He claimed that these structures can even increase 'investment that helps the poor'.[32]

But how could you tell if a company was using offshore structures in legitimate, or illegitimate, ways? It seemed like you had to take corporations' and the IFC's word for it. And in an era of repeated international tax scandals, including the Panama Papers and Paradise Papers revelations, fewer were willing to do this.

In Nigeria, the International Consortium for Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) and other reporters found that a giant power plant project – which also received money from the IFC and the Dutch development bank FMO – had been 'structured to funnel money tax-free through a network of Mauritius offshore companies to trusts and private equity firms'.[33]

Investigative journalists involved in the international Finance Uncovered network meanwhile found that Uganda had missed out on as much as $38 million in tax revenues due to how another energy investment there was structured, so that the company Umeme Holdings (which was also incorporated in Mauritius, and had also received IFC support) was not charged capital gains tax when it sold its stake in the project.[34]

Malawi mangoes

In 2014, the founders and managing directors of Malawi Mangoes, Jonathan Jacobs and Craig Hardie, said the investments they received from the IFC – along with financing from other international development institutions such as the Dutch FMO – had put them 'on the path to … becoming the leading agro-processing company on the African continent'.[35]

Because it was registered in Mauritius, where such information was not disclosed or accessible, we could not find full details about its annual revenues, profits or how much tax it was paying. However, it had been reported locally in Malawi that the company had secured 1,700 hectares of farmland to expand its plantation operations, and that its mango exports so far were already worth more than $1.4 million.[36]

We also managed to construct a timeline. Malawi Mangoes was first incorporated in the UK in 2009, according to records from Britain's Companies House.[37] By 2013, a company appeared on its list of shareholders: Malawi Mangoes (Mauritius) Limited. The UK entity was dissolved in 2015. By then, Malawi Mangoes had incorporated two companies in Mauritius (in 2012 and 2013), under its global business system.

In other words – the company moved to Mauritius after it had already been established, with its intention from the start pretty clear in its name: to do something with mangoes in Malawi. The idea that it wouldn't have opened operations on the continent without the island 'gateway' into Africa inspiring and encouraging it seemed far-fetched – it was always planning to work there.

The IFC's disclosures meanwhile included hints of possible problems on the ground.[38] In 2014, it said that Malawi Mangoes had more than 600 employees, most of them men (with only eighty-five women), with the lowest-paid workers making just $35 a month. It described employee training as a 'non-financial performance bonus' and said the company also subsidised maize purchases for its workers during periods of the year when they could not afford them.

These disclosures further said that the company had 'access to competitive sources of key inputs, such as labour, land and water' but that there were 'social risks and challenges, especially at the farm level'. It stressed: 'Managing workforce issues and community expectations will be crucial to maintaining the company's social license to operate. The business growth is dependent on a large workforce.'[39]

The company had its own plantations, and also bought fruit from local small-scale farmers through 'outgrower' schemes. In 2017, a report in the Blantyre-based Maravi Post claimed that a senior chief in Salima district had 'made shabby land deals' with Malawi Mangoes, allegedly pocketing proceeds and leaving affected families largely uncompensated.[40] Vigils were reportedly organized for eighteen days at Salima District Commission offices to demand the chief's removal.

'This land was sold dubiously to foreigners, without consultations but only telling us that it was [the] government which allocated it,' one demonstrator, Muhamad Chingomanje, was quoted as saying. 'We are not against developmental projects on our land, but … we want to benefit from its proceeds'.[41]

Back at the CIJ, we told Gavin about what we had learned in Mauritius and other countries around the world, about corporations' takeover of territory in the form of Special Economic Zones, 'private cities' and 'fiscal paradises'.

But we'd seen something else in Mauritius, and elsewhere, that we wanted to turn to next. Everywhere we'd looked on the island we'd seen private security guards: at offices, hospitals, construction sites, restaurants. We'd also heard reports, through our growing network of contacts with civil society activists around the world, of private security and mercenaries hired by corporations to grab land or quash dissent around their expanding empires.

Max Weber, the famous German sociologist, had said that control over territory was a fundamental 'characteristic of the state' – and that sovereign states had a monopoly on the 'legitimate' use of force within this territory.[42] What if, we wondered, they don't?

Gavin listened closely as we explained what we'd planned next – another global investigation, into 'corporate armies'. He asked how we'd keep ourselves safe, and then added: 'This is major. Who controls the guns, controls the world.'

PART FOUR

Corporate armies

Chapter 16
Peace without democracy

A world government

In historical archives, we came across many people who had helped to create international systems and strategies to enhance the scale and power of corporate empires. They included the German banker Hermann Abs, who had lobbied elites for a new global 'Capitalist Magna Carta' and justice system to enforce it; Irish entrepreneur Brendan O'Regan who'd pushed his national government to establish a Free Zone enclave that would inspire China; and World Bank presidents who led the creation of a new branch to invest international development money, supposed to help end global poverty, in private companies.

While the big businesses that would benefit from these moves included well-known names – from Lidl, 'Europe's Wal-Mart', to the banana giant Chiquita – few of these systems' pioneers had household names, though they were key to helping us understand this story. This felt especially true for Eugene Staley, an American economist who in the 1950s would join the Stanford Research Institute (SRI) think tank that was a co-organizer, with TIME magazine, of the San Francisco conference at which Abs presented his proposal to a room including CEOs and politicians, Nelson Rockefeller and Richard Nixon.

Born in 1906, in the tiny town of Friend, Nebraska, in his twenties Staley had travelled east to Chicago to study at what would become America's premier twentieth-century headquarters for elite academic advocacy of 'free-market' economics. He enrolled at the University of Chicago just a few years ahead of Milton Friedman, one of its best-known graduates. Unlike Friedman – who became a famous advisor to Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher – Staley's seemed like a name that was largely lost to history.

He caught our attention because, as a precocious 29-year-old assistant professor at the University of Chicago, he'd written a sweeping study called War and the Private Investor.[1] It read remarkably like a planning document for much of what we'd seen around the world. It boldly recommended nothing less than a World Government to prevent 'innumerable conflicts between native populations and foreign employers or landowners' that he suggested were otherwise inevitable as 'the "backward" peoples grow stronger'.[2]

In 1935, Staley had both predicted and called for the construction of new global infrastructure to protect and advance corporations' interests worldwide. Among them: a new World Commercial Court and World Investment Bank.

As we studied his proposals we used yellow highlighters to mark key lines to share with each other, as well as with Gavin afterwards. It was futile to resist the 'world-wide sweep of capitalist development', Staley had argued, warning that a lot of blood could be spilled as people rebelled against it. To prevent this, he seemed to propose peace without democracy – with a 'long-range plan for world statesmanship' to wrench power from states and give it to new supranational institutions.[3]

Staley had criticised politicians of his day in Europe and the US for focusing on their own citizens, industries and economic plans (be they in socialist, communist, fascist or 'new deal' styles). His idea seemed not to give more power to the people, or ensure that governments become more responsive. Rather, he proposed new world institutions that must be 'separate from the political ambitions and expediencies, the emotionality, and the fluctuating policies' of states.[4]

A World Commercial Court, Staley had written, could give private, international investors 'direct access' to a new justice system to protect their interests and resolve disputes without violence. A World Investment Bank would channel money to their companies and help them to expand. He knew that these were radical ideas. 'Are these suggestions shocking?' he asked rhetorically. It could take decades to create this new World Government, he conceded – but, he argued: 'work can be started today'.[5]

Staley's War and the Private Investor came out two years after his adopted city of Chicago hosted the 1933 World's Fair 'Century of Progress' exposition with the chilling motto: 'Science Finds, Industry Applies, Man Adapts'.[6] It was widely reported on and photographed, providing a colourful window into the economist's context.

The event promised visitors a 'glimpse of a happier not-too-distant future, all driven by innovation in science and technology'.[7] To do this, it seemed to place private companies centre-stage, presenting them as essential for human progress. Coca-Cola showed off a new, automated soda fountain.[8] Giant car companies displayed new models and celebrities including Judy Garland performed.[9]

Chicago at this time, like much of the US, was reeling from widespread unemployment and poverty.[10] The Great Depression threw the legitimacy of Wall Street and banks into question for millions of people who lost their homes, jobs and savings. Corporations and financial elites faced growing challenges from workers' movements in rich countries, while in colonial empires campaigns for independence grew.

Staley's study foresaw a turning point in world history. As the oppressed 'wake to political consciousness', he wrote, they will try to use 'the power of the state' to change their situations. This included via 'labour codes drawn in the interest of workers' and the 'break-up of large landed estates' in favour of those 'who actually till the soil'.[11]

Will the rights of private investors be enforced, he asked, 'against the wishes' of these people? If they aren't, he predicted a new era of violent conflicts around the world, even large-scale international wars. After all, corporations by that point had already amassed experience 'fomenting revolutions, using private armies'.[12]

Staley recounted corporate histories of aggression, including those of 'sovereign companies' that led the expansion of European empires, governed whole territories and sometimes had their own police forces. Other investors had operated in 'special concessions', he said, with 'government-like authority', imposing their will as law. In Africa, companies were acquiring large tracts of the best land, telling local farmers: 'starve or abandon their accustomed way of life and go to work for the companies'.[13]

He asked: 'Consider the fleets and the economic resources of some of the large fruit companies and the oil companies. Is it better to have them take over their own protection?'[14] Like the Chicago's World Fair, he seemed to present private enterprise and its global expansion as essential to the future of human progress. The young economist thus presented only two options: restrict international investments (though he said this was 'utterly futile', as well as 'poor policy') – or create a 'world governmental authority' to end and prevent conflicts: from riots and strikes to armed rebellions and wars.[15]

We had never heard of Staley before but were struck by how he had described much of what we had been investigating. Along with proposals mirroring the international legal and development systems we'd dug into, his book had also spoken about corporate control over territory, and the use of force. Rather than challenging these trends, he seemed to propose institutionalising them.

Long-range plans

Long before the 'Washington Consensus', before the creation of institutions like the World Bank, and even before the Second World War, elites gathered to lay ambitious international plans to protect private empires and profits from the threats posed by movements for independence and democracy.

Take for example the International Chamber of Commerce, which said it worked for 'the integration of business and economic concerns into policy-making'.[16] It offered companies 'unrivalled access' to governments and it had developed what it called 'privileged links' with other bodies like the World Trade Organization, enabling 'the voice of business' to be heard there.[17] It was founded more than a century ago, in 1919.

In the 1920s, a 'supranational federation of capitalists' met in Vienna and Geneva to plan how to protect themselves from nationalist, socialist and anti-imperialist campaigns after the First World War and amid the Great Depression.[18] They included the famous Austrian economists Ludwig von Mises and Fredrich Hayek (who would later go on to found the Mont Pelerin Society to spearhead academic advocacy of neoliberalism).

Quinn Slobodian, a historian at Wellesley College in Massachusetts, studied this period for his 2018 book Globalists: The End of Empire and the Birth of Neoliberalism. Far from wanting to 'liberate' private capital and end regulation and states, he described how the people involved in these discussions sought to rewrite rules on a global scale to support their interests, and 'encase' or insulate them from 'mass demands for social justice'.[19]

In the 1950s, the infamously secretive Bilderberg Conferences joined the infrastructure of elite international networking. Later, British Lord Denis Healey, a veteran member of this club, told The Guardian that what it wanted was to see international wars end – but it was 'not wholly unfair' to say they 'were striving for a one-world government' to achieve this.[20] It sounded like a version of Staley's older proposal, for a new era of world peace without democracy.

Also better known than Staley's 1930s proposals for a new World Government was the so-called Powell Memorandum.[21] It was sent in 1971 by Lewis Powell, an American corporate lawyer who was on the boards of eleven companies, to his friend Eugene Sydnor, Jr. at the US Chamber of Commerce, the most powerful pro-business lobbying group in the country. It had been confidential, but it was leaked to journalists after Powell was nominated by then President Nixon to be a US Supreme Court judge.[22] It became known as a key document marking the rise of 'neoliberalism' in the US and the expansion of corporations into what seemed like every aspect of public and political life.

The 'business and the enterprise system are in deep trouble, and the hour is late', Powell had warned. 'Perfectly respectable elements of society', including college students, journalists and some politicians, were treating corporations with near contempt, without 'sympathy for the businessman or his viewpoint'. Corporations, he argued, should respond with counter-attacks and by working together to defend 'the system'. Specific recommendations included advertising to 'support the system' rather than individual companies or products. 'Strength lies in organisation,' he'd argued.

Like Staley, and other people and institutions we came across in our investigations, Powell was thinking long term. To counteract threats to big business, and build a world more amenable to it, he called for 'careful long-range planning and implementation … over an indefinite period of years'.[23]

The lawyer's 1971 memo did seem to have been influential. Numerous new, conservative think tanks such as the Heritage Foundation and the Cato Institute were set up in its wake. Millions of dollars a year were spent to influence public and political debates – while Ronald Reagan in the US, and Margaret Thatcher in the UK, made neoliberalism state policy.

However, not everyone agreed with his analysis that 'the system' was at risk. In the same year Powell sent his memo, US economist Raymond Vernon – who was later credited for providing intellectual weight for mass privatisation campaigns, and dubbed 'the father of globalisation' – published a book called Sovereignty at Bay. The expansion of global corporations had already proceeded to such a degree, he argued, that 'concepts such as sovereignty and national economic strength appear curiously drained of meaning'.[24]

Also in the 1970s, the World Economic Forum joined the list of elite networking spaces. A new CEO-led World Business Council for Sustainable Development emerged in the 1990s. Other regional groups formed with names like the European Roundtable of Industrialists and the Transatlantic Business Dialogue. While details of what goes on in these places were hard to come by, their establishment and impacts had not gone unnoticed.

'Elected by and accountable to no one, secretive and highly organized, these shadow sovereigns are destroying the very notion of the common good and making a mockery of democracy,' said Susan George at the Transnational Institute research group in Amsterdam, describing how large corporations were operating 'behind the scenes' to manage 'world-wide public policy'.[25]

The key questions of our time, British writer Hilary Wainwright argued, were 'not just about corporate greed, irresponsible lending, or outsourcing, but also the model of the downsized state, of allowing only corporations to plan'.[26]

As we'd learned, such plans often had very long time-scales – much longer than the terms of elected representatives. The seeds of the strategies we saw in person, in our investigations around the world, were planted long before we were born. They seemed to have been tested on vulnerable people – including amid the Vietnam War, it seemed, when we saw Staley's name pop up again.

A monstrous blueprint

Powell's memo had come to light as labour, consumer, environmental and anti-imperialist movements were gaining ground around the world.

In the early 1970s, some newly independent countries in former colonial empires were – as Staley had predicted decades earlier – changing rules to support local industries, and in some cases they were also reclaiming land and nationalizing enterprises. In the US, meanwhile, new regulations were being passed and restrictions were being imposed on businesses to protect workers, consumers and the environment. 'Virtually the entire American business community,' wrote political scientist David Vogel about this time, faced 'a series of political setbacks without parallel in the postwar period'.[27]

By then, Staley had long since left the University of Chicago. While he'd become 'a distinguished but relatively obscure academic', in the words of historian David Elliott, he would also be a 'major architect of the Kennedy administration's Vietnam policy'.[28]

Set up by Stanford University trustees, the SRI think tank that Staley joined was created as a 'comprehensive research organisation' with 'the resources of a great university', working for government, military and corporate clients.[29] Several of its directors came from, or would go on to work for, places like General Electric and the DuPont chemical giant.[30]

Until the 1990s, this outfit ran the International Industrial Development Conference (IIDC) – which TIME-LIFE had co-sponsored in 1957, when the German banker Abs spoke about his corporate 'Magna Carta' idea. It was held every four years in San Francisco, attended by CEOs and top politicians. Satellite meetings were also held internationally, from Austria to Indonesia.[31]

At this organisation, Staley's work included advising American policy towards China, and how to go about 'halting the advance of Communism in the rest of the Far East'. In 1961, he led President John F. Kennedy's so-called special financial group to Vietnam to plan 'coordinated financial action which would be in support of counter-guerrilla activities'. His final report called for 'stepped-up economic and social action, especially in rural areas, closely integrated with the military action'.[32]

In addition to offensive actions against North Vietnam, what became known as the 'Staley Report' called for the regrouping of villages and resettling of people into dozens of new 'prosperity zones' and 'strategic hamlets', to focus economic and social activities.[33] It was effectively a 'blueprint', said Australian journalist Wilfred Burchett, 'for a vast military campaign, very soon to be run by the United States itself, to try and herd the whole of South Vietnam's peasantry into 16,000 concentration camps'.[34]

It was a 'monstrous' programme, Burchett said, that 'brought the whole of the peasantry out in armed revolt'. He drew comparisons with concentration camps in British colonial Kenya, but after our investigations into the carving out of territory into special economic zones, and after we'd seen language like 'prosperity' being deployed to promote elite interests globally, Staley's designs in Vietnam also sounded chillingly contemporary to us.

SRI's role in that war, including Staley's work, was controversial on Stanford's campus. Students on a working group, set up specifically to explore options for the university's relationship with the outfit, noted how it had also become a key 'coordinator of overseas corporate strategy'. In a report, these students described the think tank's leaders as 'expansionists', providing 'strategic leadership and technical manpower for the international expansion of West Coast corporations' while also supporting the development of a 'supranational union of private enterprise'.[35]

Alongside government and military 'counterinsurgency' research projects, SRI worked on the prospects for US private capital overseas, which were also often framed as part of the fight against communism. Newly independent countries, argued one of Staley's colleagues, still needed 'Western guidance and Western concepts of individual freedom'.[36]

Eventually SRI was formally spun off from Stanford to become a separate company, SRI International. It also launched new ventures including long-term 'scenario planning' for big businesses (research envisaging the future in fifteen years or more, for instance, considering social, political and other risks to corporate profits, and how to prepare for or fight them).[37] This kind of planning is still on the menu of services offered by corporate consultants.

Staley was right that multinational businesses would only continue to grow. By 1970, there were 7,000 corporations operating across borders.[38] By 2011, there were more than 100,000 multinational enterprises with almost 900,000 foreign affiliates.[39] No country has jurisdiction over all of their activities. Their resources had boomed – the revenues of the world's largest companies exceeded the GDPs of most states[40] – as had their political power through new world institutions, as we had learned and as Staley had suggested.

But the global advance of multinational companies had largely failed to deliver on promises of prosperity – and peace – for all. It also seemed clear to us that new supranational systems and strategies to secure and support private investments had not quashed people's demands for democracy and social justice.

While Staley had said a new world government could stem conflicts, some corporations were still being accused of using force to get what they wanted. Others seemed to have made violence, or the threat of it, their core business. This was what we'd decided to investigate next: corporate control over the use of force, globally.

Dictatorship of flies

One of the businesses that Staley's War and the Private Investor treatise had looked at was the United Fruit Company, whose history stretched back to the nineteenth century. Now this corporation was known as Chiquita Brands International. It had multi-billion dollar annual revenues, operations in dozens of countries and you could see its bright blue and yellow logo stickered onto bananas sold around the world.

In the 1930s, Staley had described how the United Fruit Company had seemed similar to a colonial 'chartered company' in that it had undertaken 'government-like functions' including the construction of railways and 'whole cities … performing the necessary work of sanitation, laying out streets, building private and public buildings, public utilities, churches, schools, hotels, restaurants, and hospitals'. It had 'created and deposed governments, ruled vast plantations with a free hand, and in some cases exercised almost sovereign powers over large portions of Central America'.[41]

But unlike chartered companies, it was not acting at the behest of a colonial government to expand their empire. It was focused on its own expansion and, Staley said, only did 'developmental work as an incidental but necessary step in a profit-making business'.[42]

By the time Staley's text came out, this corporation's activities had become notoriously intertwined with violence. In 1928, workers went on strike in protest against poor pay and working conditions at its plantations in Colombia.[43] The government then sent soldiers who fired on crowds in what became known as the 'Masacre de las Bananeras' (Banana massacre). Gabriel García Márquez, born that year, would later allude to this event in One Hundred Years of Solitude, describing a military attack ending in the deaths of plantation workers in a fictional town.[44]

In 1950, the company would appear in the works of another famous Latin American author: Pablo Neruda, from Chile. A poem he wrote that year was entitled 'United Fruit Co' and named it alongside the Coca-Cola Company and other American corporations expanding in the region. It used biblical language to satirize these expansions that 'rebaptized these countries Banana Republics' and 'abolished free will, gave out imperial crowns, encouraged envy, attracted the dictatorship of flies'. It described how what would become Chiquita took over 'the most juicy piece' of territory in 'my world, the delicate waist of America'.[45]

While Neruda's poem made the rounds and encouraged people's movements resisting corporations' expansions, the United Fruit Company added to its track record of violence. It lobbied the US to take action against Guatemala's democratically elected, social democratic president Jacobo Arbenz.[46] A CIA-backed coup d'état installed military dictator Carlos Castillo Armas.[47] A civil war ensued, and what the UN termed a genocide against indigenous Maya people.[48]

In Colombia, the company had meanwhile maintained and expanded massive operations throughout that country's civil war – which began in the 1960s and lasted for more than forty years – and it had again been implicated in violence there. The company eventually admitted to at least 100 payments between 1997 and 2004, for a total of $1.7 million, to the United Self-Defence Forces of Colombia (AUC) ultra-right-wing paramilitary group, whose attacks on peasants and dissidents over many years had become well-known.[49]

More recently, Chiquita had again been implicated in attacks against peasants opposing their plantations' expansion in Colombia. There was a live legal case against it from some of these people, supported by human rights lawyers.

We wanted to know more about all of this – and how this company could keep popping up, from Staley's study in the 1930s to our research today, in stories of violence. Staley had named it as an example of a company whose expansion was inevitable, futile to resist and likely to be violent unless new global institutions were set up to manage and prevent conflicts with unruly populations. Much of the infrastructure he'd called for may have come into being – but it seemed the peace he said would come with it, had not.

We reached out to human rights groups and other journalists in Colombia, and started to plan a trip there. When we had a draft itinerary, we knocked on Gavin's door.

'You're off again?' he grinned as we sat down with our notes and a map of the country, on which we'd circled locations that came up in our research. Places where attacks had happened, or where we could meet people to learn more.

Our first stop would be Medellín, Colombia's second-largest city which had been established and developed under the Spanish empire and named after a small town in Spain. It had also been a key commercial hub since the nineteenth century when it began exporting gold and then coffee. In the twentieth century, it grew with industrialization and new transport links to other regions, although it also became infamous for crime and Pablo Escobar's 'Medellín Cartel'.

The first person we'd meet would be Nick MacWilliam, a journalist who covered Latin America, with whom we planned to work. Then, together, we'd meet plaintiffs in a class action lawsuit filed against Chiquita in the US and supported by lawyers at the NGO EarthRights International.

These people, anonymous in the suit, were understandably nervous about speaking out. They accused the company of hiring paramilitaries who killed their family members. They agreed to speak with us – but only in person.

The banana giant wasn't the only company expanding in Colombia and leaving allegations of violence in its wake, and we'd look into other cases too. In particular, those relating to mining activities in that country, as well as expanding palm oil plantations in Honduras in Central America. In each place, we had interviews lined up with peasant leaders and others with first-hand experience of these conflicts.

'Can I come?' Gavin chuckled. It wasn't a real question – he had a stack of papers on his desk reflecting the work he had to do to keep the CIJ going; he was always fundraising and meeting people to start new projects and partnerships. But it meant he thought we were still on the right track.

'Be careful,' he said more seriously. 'It's good that you're going – there's no other way to speak to some of these people. But it sounds like they're cautious for good reasons, and you should be too!'

'Plan every detail, every step,' he told us. 'Get there early, before your interviews start, and scope things out. Locations. Exits. Back-ups. Line it all up.'

Back in our windowless room down the hall, we made more detailed notes for our trip and booked flights. A few weeks later, we were in the air.

Chapter 17
Profits versus peasants

Nightmares in Colombia

Anabel (not her real name) was at first elusive. It took days of back-and-forth messages, reassuring her that we would keep her identity confidential, to finally receive the address of a meeting place where she'd feel safe.

She was understandably skittish. She was one of several Afro-Colombians who said they had survived violence by paramilitaries hired by Chiquita to help protect and expand its plantations. She wanted justice for what she had endured – but was afraid that by speaking out she could be risking her life.

Eventually, she sent us the address near the trendy El Poblado district of downtown Medellín – which was seen as one of the safest and most affluent parts of the city, and popular with foreign tourists and expats. We memorized the address and then deleted the message. We didn't tell anyone where we were going, or speak to each other about it in public. It was safer that way.

When we met, Anabel seemed to have little interest in light chit-chat. She gave one-word answers to questions about how she was doing, how her week had been. After gathering the courage to meet us, she seemed to want to dive right into her story – and, perhaps, leave as quickly as possible.

She began in 1997, when she was a 10-year-old child living with her parents in the small city of Apartadó in the mountainous Antioquia region not far from the border with Panama. Colombia's civil war, which had begun more than thirty years before her birth, featured heavily in her memories of growing up. 'There were a lot of massacres, too many deaths', she recalled. 'You could see the manner in which they left bodies as well. Often dismembered. It was a horrible war.'

Across Colombia there were stories like this of violence, often perpetrated by right-wing paramilitary groups that developed during the civil war as private militias to defend landed interests and proliferated in the 1970s.

Decades later, land seen as valuable was still being forcibly seized across the country by paramilitaries who then sold it to rich individuals or corporations. Resistance, according to rights groups, was often met with violence.

Anabel knew this history first-hand. Her family, she said, had long received threats from such paramilitaries who wanted the land used for her stepfather's banana farm. In 1997, he gave in, aware of the dangers of saying no. He tried to avoid violence by selling the paramilitaries his land.

But the sale did not go as planned. He brought his wife and Anabel with him to meet the buyer – who was on time, but unexpectedly said he had to go urgently to another town, and ushered them all into a waiting taxi with him.

Soon after the taxi started driving it stopped, the buyer got out and another man came in and pulled out a gun. Other men on motorbikes accompanied the taxi to the end of a dirt road, where the adults were ordered to get out.

The men then beat and then shot her stepfather, killing him. Her mother tried to run; she was shot and killed, too. The men took the papers they needed to own the land, without paying for it, and had the taxi bring Anabel into town.

In the aftermath of these murders, Anabel went to the police where she reported them. Later, she learned that the taxi driver, who she believed was involved, had been identified. But, as far as she knew, no case against him or the murderers was ever brought, and the land was never returned to her.

'As I didn't have parents, it was very hard to confront the world', she told us. 'People made fun of me, I had to see psychologists.' Years after their deaths, she said she struggled to trust people and that 'I still have nightmares. I cannot say that the issue doesn't dominate my thoughts. You cannot imagine the effort I'm making to not cry now. It's extremely hard'.

Later, we met another woman with a similarly horrific story. Like Anabel, she said that her family members were also killed by paramilitaries and that the police did nothing to help her. In Bogota, another plaintiff in the suit against Chiquita, Fernando, said he believed that the company had started working with paramilitaries in the early 1990s, 'to confront banana workers'.

At that time, the governor of the Antioquia region of Urabá was Alvaro Uribe Velez (who later became president), who Fernando told us 'was a participant and collaborator with these armed groups … They decided that the unionists were guerrillas, but we were workers, we were fighting, and defending worker rights. Uribe was one of the people who formed the convivir groups in Urabá from paramilitaries.'

'They killed people with chainsaws, with machetes, they set them alight with gasoline', Fernando added, recalling the violence he'd lived through. 'They raped women and girls. They burnt houses.' Stories like this were painful to listen to but were not exceptional. Rather, they seemed to haunt much of Colombian society.

The toll of the war had been vast for many peasant, poor, indigenous and Black communities. But now there seemed to be hope for some justice on the horizon, because of the courage of people like Anabel and Fernando who had agreed to testify, anonymously, against Chiquita in the US.

Challenging impunity

Chiquita had developed significant operations in Urabá, a northwest sub-region which had become Colombia's top banana-growing area. This is where Anabel had lived with her mother and stepfather before they were killed.

Several AUC paramilitary commanders were now in US prisons, including Salvatore Mancuso, extradited and then imprisoned on drug trafficking charges in 2015.[1] A diplomatic cable sent from the US embassy in Bogotá to Washington DC years before this, and published by WikiLeaks, said he allegedly had ties to politicians, retired generals and businesses, and that he'd named Chiquita as among the companies that had regularly paid paramilitaries.[2]

Another AUC commander extradited and imprisoned in the US was Hebert Veloza – alias 'H.H'.[3] He was known as the leader of the group's Bloque Bananero in Urabá that had been implicated in many murders. Anabel said she believed he was one of the people behind the deaths of her mother and stepfather – but he was also in jail for drug trafficking charges, not murder.

Living free in the US, meanwhile, was another man with questions to answer: John Ordman. He was a high-ranking executive at Chiquita responsible for much of the company's Colombia operations and, according to a 2016 court filing by the NGO EarthRights, 'involved in the approval of "sensitive" payments to the convivirs' – 'self-defence' groups created to protect private estates.

Human rights groups said convivirs were essentially legalized paramilitaries, and that they had committed massacres and other abuses. The court filing continued: '[Ordman] testified that he had extensive conversations with Chiquita personnel in Colombia about the different violent groups Chiquita was paying'.

Internal Chiquita communications from 2000 noted the connection between the convivirs and the AUC, revealing that Chiquita chose to 'continue making the payments [because they] can't get the same level of support from the military'. At the time paramilitaries were regularly killing and dismembering people all over Colombia. But Chiquita claimed it didn't know exactly what its money would be used for.

Under then-President Uribe, in 2003 the AUC initiated a demobilization process which saw tens of thousands of men reintegrate into Colombian society. Some regrouped in armed gangs and continued to coordinate terror networks.[4]

Several years later, Colombia's Supreme Court unearthed the 'Parapolitics scandal' which placed 139 elected politicians under investigation for their alleged links to paramilitary organizations, including payments. Former Senator Mario Uribe Escobar – the president's cousin – was among those arrested and sent to prison.[5]

Former AUC commanders however received little to no punishment for their crimes. Then, they started admitting what they'd done – and with whom. In 2008, Uribe had fourteen senior paramilitary commanders, including Mancuso and others later named in the Chiquita lawsuit, extradited to the US where they were now in prison on drugs charges.[6] Many suspected that Uribe did this for his own protection, as several commanders claimed to have collaborated with him.

No one at Chiquita went to prison, and no relatives of the victims of violence received compensation. Then, in 2007, the NGO EarthRights filed the US federal class-action lawsuit against the company on behalf of Colombian families whose loved ones were killed.[7] Portions of the case were brought under the Alien Tort Statute, which allows human rights claims from victims of US multinational companies' activities abroad to be filed within the US court system.

This potentially progressive piece of legislation often failed the people it was meant to serve, including in Colombia. In recent decades, various suits against US corporations had been dismissed by courts which said they still fell outside their jurisdiction.[8] Chiquita had similarly filed a motion to have the EarthRights case dismissed, arguing that there were insufficient US ties to be heard in US courts.[9]

Terry Collingsworth, a Washington DC-based lawyer who'd worked on many cases under the Alien Tort Statute, filed some of the earlier motions on behalf of Colombian communities in the Chiquita case. He told us cases against such companies must be heard – but that this law had been difficult to apply in practice.

A 2013 decision in a separate case, against an oil company, seemed to have set a conservative precedent. That company said that despite the fact that it had US operations, the allegations against it were from foreign plaintiffs about its foreign business and all relevant decisions had been made abroad. In a 5–4 ruling, right-wing Supreme Court judges agreed with the company that the law only applied if allegations 'touch and concern the territory of the United States'.[10]

This ruling significantly limited the ability of the Alien Tort Statute to help people like Anabel in Colombia secure justice, Collingsworth said. The law should be 'redefined', he argued, but he thought that US lawmakers were 'very unlikely to champion a law that will be strongly opposed by the major business organisations, like the US Chamber of Commerce and the US Council for International Business'.

Colombia's domestic system also held little hope for victims of violence. Fifty-seven companies, including Chiquita, had been charged with supporting the AUC[11] – but local lawyers we spoke to suspected that the government wouldn't prosecute or otherwise try to hold them accountable.

Amid these obstacles came a significant development in late 2016 – when, after nine years of litigation, a federal judge ruled that the case supported by the NGO EarthRights could continue in American courts.[12] The claims against Chiquita (and certain executives) would move forward in the US, despite efforts to prevent this.

Though by 2021, Doe v. Chiquita Brands International would still be in the courts, and its plaintiffs would still be waiting to see if they would ever get justice.

More hired guns

In 2016, the Colombian government and the country's oldest left-wing guerrilla insurgency, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), negotiated a historic peace deal. Under it, thousands of guerrillas would hand over their weapons and live in demobilization zones before integrating into society.[13]

Opponents of this peace deal – chiefly the conservative party of former President Uribe – had argued that it would allow people who had committed human rights violations to go free. And while Uribe liked to focus on the crimes of the FARC, right-wing paramilitaries had left a violent legacy of their own – one which seemed inextricably tied to US multinational companies like Chiquita.

In the fanfare around the peace deal, the role of multinational corporations in the violence was largely ignored by commentators and media reports. For others, it was hard to forget. 'Some multinationals have directly collaborated with illegal paramilitary groups, but many others have turned a blind eye to human rights abuses', said Grace Livingstone, the author of Inside Colombia: Drugs, Democracy and War.

She told us:

> Multinational companies have benefited as paramilitaries have violently evicted thousands of people from their land, clearing the way for large-scale mining, oil or agro-industrial projects. These companies are knowingly operating in a country where death squads suppress dissent by targeting community activists and trade unionists … There is almost total impunity for the security forces and their paramilitary allies who target land activists and community leaders and those who have protested against large-scale mining, oil and agro-industrial projects.

Gimena Sánchez, an analyst at an NGO called the Washington Office on Latin America added: 'The impunity rate is over 95 per cent for killings of trade unionists and for the others probably close to that. Colombian authorities, when pressured, may begin investigations but very few of the perpetrators are brought to justice'.

Chiquita wasn't the only company that paid paramilitaries in Colombia; the Dole and Del Monte fruit companies had also reportedly hired them.[14] Such payments had enabled paramilitaries to expand – potentially prolonging the war, as well as protecting and helping to expand corporate assets and operations.

The most militant peoples' struggles against corporations in Colombia, when we arrived in the country, seemed to be around mining. A Dutch NGO had recently published a report on the collusion of mining multinationals Drummond and Glencore with paramilitaries over ten years from the mid-1990s.[15]

At the Medellín office of a campesino (peasant) organisation called the Humanitarian Action Corporation for Coexistence and Peace in Northeast Antioqueño (Cahucopana), we met then 26-year-old Yoladis Cerpa from one of Colombia's more violent areas. 'My family lives in El Bagre but because of my work in social organisations I can't go there', she told us. 'Two days ago they killed my brother. In fact, my mother is calling me right now, they're in the cemetery as we speak.'

As we spoke, Cerpa showed us her phone. WhatsApp messages with pictures of her brother's coffin popped up as relatives sent her updates from the funeral she couldn't attend. She described widespread fear that ran through the area because of paramilitary violence. 'We are threatened daily by email, by telephone, by any means. The problem now is they killed one of the social leaders, and there's displacement in the villages. They dismembered one of them totally, the others were forced to leave. They threatened them. There are deaths every day.'

Cerpa believed that organizers were being targeted due to the social work they do. 'They are defending the campesinos, defending human rights and making it harder for the multinationals to enter campesino regions', she told us.

El Bagre had large deposits of gold and this seemed to make its human rights situation worse. Cerpa described it as a 'very rich region for mining for gold' with land-hungry companies on one side and campesinos on the other, 'fighting to defend their rights'.

'Another multinational tried to enter the region but the campesinos, we didn't allow it. It was amazing,' she said. But there had been many more casualties too; recently the body of William Castillo – who had worked for the Association of Agroecological and Mining Fraternities of Guamocó (Aheramigua), a human rights organisation of farmers and artisanal miners – was found.

'They shot him,' Cerpa told us, after a meeting he had held with local community leaders in which he 'was training them about their rights'.

She said it seemed 'impossible' to hold multinational corporations to account. But she thought that it was clear why people were being targeted – for opposing these businesses' interests. 'We are living the conflict,' she told us, 'and the threats we receive from paramilitaries are always for this, that they're going to kill us because we're working with campesinos, because we're training them to defend their land, for these kinds of things'.

A militia in Honduras

North of Colombia, Honduras in Central America was known as one of the deadliest countries for environmental and human rights defenders.[16] The situation had even come to the attention of the International Criminal Court which warned in 2015 that 'criminal organisations and international drug cartels are deeply involved in local businesses … and seem to be involved in most of the alleged crimes in the Bajo Aguán [valley], including unlawful occupation of land and robbery of African palm fruits, in order to retain control of the region and to continue to operate in total impunity.'[17]

The next year, a prominent activist in the fertile Bajo Aguán – Jose Angel Flores, head of the Unified Campesinos Movement of the Aguan Valley, or MUCA – was killed while under police protection.[18] Numerous such incidents had involved paramilitaries or private security forces, which reportedly outnumbered police five to one.[19]

The NGO EarthRights was also involved in a case seeking justice for people affected by this violence – and in the process, their work was bringing new details to light about how some giant corporations had effectively built their own private armies.

The company at the centre of that case was Dinant, founded by the late businessman Miguel Facussé who was one of the most powerful men in the country until his death in 2015, at 90-years-old. For decades from the 1980s, he had been vice-president of the Asociación para el Progreso de Honduras (APROH), a right-wing grouping of business interests and members of the armed forces. A widely publicized memo he wrote in the 1980s had argued that the best way forward for the poor country was to 'sell Honduras to the foreign investor'.[20]

Dinant – which produced food and cleaning supplies, including for export throughout the region and beyond – owned more than 22,000 acres of palm oil plantations in the Bajo Aguan valley.[21] It had been repeatedly marred by allegations of human rights abuses against local people.

In 2012, Facussé was described by the Reporters without Borders NGO as having 'a private militia that can count on support from the police and army to impose his will'.[22] Accusations that this militia had killed unruly agricultural workers who had occupied company land led to the withdrawal in 2011 of a $20m loan from a German government agency, and to the Électricité de France power company cancelling the purchase of carbon credits from Dinant.[23]

But justice for people who said they survived such violence seemed out of reach. Dinant denied any involvement – claiming that it operated in a violent context, but had nothing to do with this. Behind it were powerful backers, including part of the international development system we'd investigated.

The World Bank's long history in the Bajo Aguán valley included support for a controversial land modernization programme in the 1990s that had been criticised for paving the way for large-scale plantations at the expense of small-scale farmers.[24] In 2009, the bank's IFC branch agreed to give Dinant, which was expanding in the region, $15 million in loans[25]; further support came in the shape of 'indirect investments', through the Ficohsa bank in Honduras and an IFC subsidiary, the Asset Management Corporation (AMC).[26]

The EarthRights-supported class action lawsuit that was shining a light on how corporations used violence to protect and expand their operations was not filed against Dinant – instead, it named as defendants the IFC and its subsidiary. The NGO's lawyers told us that the case followed years of protests and failed attempts by Honduran farmers to seek justice in their own country's courts.

This lawsuit was the second filed against the IFC in US courts – following one launched in 2015 over its financing of a coal-fired power plant in India that local communities said had destroyed their livelihoods. In that case, the development institution claimed 'absolute immunity' under a 1945 law called the International Organisations Immunities Act.[27]

The Honduran suit, filed in 2017 at a US federal court in Washington DC, included two class action claims: one regarding roughly 200 members of the Bajo Aguan's Panamá community, alleging a 'pattern of aggression, which Dinant security personnel carry out in order to intimidate and terrorise the villagers'; and the second representing roughly 1,000 people and focused on profit-making from land allegedly acquired by 'fraud, coercion, threat of violence, or actual violence', accusing the IFC of 'reaping the benefits' of historical injustices.

The full 132-page legal complaint said that plaintiffs were seeking compensation for 'murders, torture, assault, battery, trespass, unjust enrichment and other acts of aggression'. It said that ultimately the case was about World Bank entities 'knowingly profiting from the financing of murder', describing decades of violence, specific murders and a 'pattern of attacks that is ongoing'.

It elaborated: 'People have been attacked in their homes, in their gardens, while riding their bikes, driving their cars, farming their land, outside of churches …

People have lost loved ones, which can never be remedied'. Some of those killed had been families' primary breadwinners, leaving surviving relatives struggling. The goal of this violence, it said, had been 'to intimidate farmers from asserting competing rights to land that Dinant has sought to control'.

'We live from our families and our land and now we are left with nothing. We want justice … We have to move forward,' one of the case's plaintiffs said in her testimony. Her husband was allegedly shot and killed by Dinant security personnel. Another plaintiff, Juan Doe VIII, said he had witnessed farmers being pulled out of their homes and beaten. He also described how 'one bullet hit me, it still affects my breathing. I didn't realise I'd been shot, but I touched it and saw blood. Another person was shot through the stomach'.

We weren't the only people following this case closely. Kate Geary, then at a civil society watchdog called Bank Information Centre Europe, told us that local communities had clearly suffered 'appalling harms', and that it was 'high time that the IFC was made to answer in the courts for the many human rights abuses around the world that they have been linked to through their investments'.

Dinant responded angrily to our questions about this case. Roger Pineda, its corporate and banking relations director, sent us a long email in which he insisted that 'all allegations that Dinant is – or ever has been – engaged in systematic violence against members of the community are without foundation'. It was 'absurd', Pineda argued, to connect his company with 'high levels of insecurity in the Aguán valley on the grounds that several tragic deaths have occurred in the same region in which we own land'.

An IFC spokesperson meanwhile said he could not comment on ongoing litigation, but that the institution was 'saddened by the history of violence in the Aguán valley', and that it was 'focused on clients who commit to adopt internationally recognised environmental and social practices in the most challenging environments'.

A paper trail, however, showed that after complaints were lodged with the IFC's internal watchdog over its financing of Dinant, it did open an investigation – which concluded that its support for the company had failed to follow its own policies to protect local communities and environments. An 'action plan' in response to this investigation included requirements that Dinant adopt new security protocols to ensure the protection of human rights.[28]

In 2016, a company report said that it was, under IFC guidance, 'safely securing its facilities while engaging peacefully with local communities'. It said its 'grievance mechanisms, designed in collaboration with community leaders, are helping to identify practical solutions to improve local peoples' daily lives, like preventing dust and controlling traffic,' and that it had removed all firearms from security personnel at its plantations and other locations in Honduras.[29]

But EarthRights lawyers said that these moves had ‘not resulted in remedy or credible investigation for the farmers and their families’, arguing that the IFC seemed to instead be putting ‘profit before people at every turn’.

The legal complaint they filed specifically alleged that ‘guards and security agents working for Dinant continue to intimidate and kill community members and farmers’ leaders across the Aguán to this day’. It accused the IFC of having financed the company with ‘reckless disregard of the obvious and highly probable risk that their actions would result in serious harm to the plaintiffs’.

We were moved by the tenacity and commitment of these lawyers – and the courage of the farmers and villagers who were testifying about what they had witnessed, despite the risks that they would have to live with.

Years later, their struggle was still ongoing. In 2021, the lawsuit against Chiquita over violence in Colombia by paramilitaries linked to the company was still open – as was that against the IFC over their financing of the Dinant company in Honduras. This theme – impunity – would come up again in our next investigations into the privatisation of security, from Palestine to Italy.

Chapter 18
Private borders

Occupation Inc in Palestine

While travelling to our next destination – occupied Palestine – we studied a report from the non-profit Yesh Din which described how private security forces were increasingly being used by the Israeli government. Some were even 'equipped with IDF weapons, undergo military training, and are empowered to undertake policing actions, such as searches and detentions, and to use force'.[1]

We had also printed off a report from the international NGO Human Rights Watch, called 'Occupation Inc'. It detailed how 'Israeli and international businesses have helped to build, finance, service, and market settlement communities' that were being expanded in Palestine against international law. It also referenced twenty Israeli-administered industrial zones in the West Bank, plus huge amounts of agricultural land that was being overseen by Israeli settlers.[2]

Foreign investors seemed to be taking advantage of profitable business conditions offered in the settlements – low rents, Israeli state subsidies and access to cheap Palestinian labour. Foreign direct investment in the West Bank and Gaza soared from nearly $9.5 million in 2002 to almost $300 million in 2016.[3] The US computing giant Hewlett-Packard was one of the many international businesses involved – it developed biometric ID cards used at checkpoints.[4]

A few days later, we met up with Antony Loewenstein, an Australian journalist living in East Jerusalem at the time who would join us in our investigation. Together we planned our next moves. The next morning, a few hours after midnight, we left the small hotel we were staying at and got into a taxi.

It was just after four o'clock in the morning when we arrived at our destination: the Qalandia checkpoint near Jerusalem and on the border with the West Bank.

It was one of the busiest of such checkpoints through which Palestinians with the required permits could cross over into Israel. While the moon was still high in the sky, people were arriving in buses and gathering in lengthening lines.

With high rates of unemployment in the West Bank – and even more so in Gaza, where the UN said it was 'the highest in the world'[5] – many Palestinians worked in Israel, including in construction, manufacturing and agriculture.

Inside a warehouse-like building, we saw what looked like a cattle pen: metal bars formed a narrow chute, enclosing and herding Palestinians – many of whom had travelled from villages more than an hour away – towards the point where their documents would be checked by Israeli officials.

For years, these checkpoints had been manned by uniformed personnel from the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and the Israeli Border Police. But starting in 2006, gun-toting private security guards joined them. Now, twelve checkpoints in the West Bank and two on the Gaza border used such guards.

We knew that there were private guards working at the Qalandia checkpoint, but we had to look closely to spot them. They blended in well, and looked similar to the soldiers. They were similarly armed, and wearing similar uniforms. But the colour of the fabric was off – it was darker than the IDF's traditional olive green. Squinting, we made out badges that read 'Ezrachi'.

Modi'in Ezrachi was the largest security contractor employed by the Israeli government. Its guards could be seen checking the documents of bus and car passengers in Jerusalem, protecting Jewish compounds and standing watch at the Western Wall plaza. Earlier that year, at the Qalandia checkpoint where we now stood, Modi'in Ezrachi guards had shot dead two young Palestinians – Maram Saleh Abu Ismail, 23, and her 16-year-old brother Ibrahim Saleh Taha.[6]

It wasn't a one-off case. There was a long history of humiliation and violence at such checkpoints. The Israeli human-rights group B'Tselem had released many reports over the years documenting abuses.

'It depends on the individual soldier or policeman', 22-year-old Reham told us, of her experiences. 'Sometimes they let you go; they don't talk to you. Generally, girls are more mean than boys – I don't know why.' We met the university medical student near the Qalandia checkpoint. 'It's miserable', she said, of her daily commute. But when we asked her about the presence of private guards alongside state security she said 'we can't differentiate between them' – because of their similar dress and behaviour.

'They are no different from the army,' agreed a day labourer named Imad, who we met in the same line. As far as he and other people we spoke to were concerned, any Israeli with a gun and a badge seemed to have a license to humiliate them, or worse. A darker green uniform didn't change this.

Battle-tested products

Back at our hotel, we asked ourselves: Why was Israel, of all states, using private security contractors? It had a famously large conscript army, with mandatory three years' service for men and two for women (plus obligatory reserve duty for men until age 51 and for women until 24). If it needed more muscle at its borders, couldn't it have deployed more of these people?

Also, the human rights situation was already dire for Palestinians. Did adding guns-for-hire actually make things worse? People we met didn't seem to distinguish between private guards, soldiers and police, who all frightened them. So why were rights groups sounding the alarm?

When we contacted the Israeli Ministry of Defence, we were told that some 'crossings receive assistance from companies specialising in security and protection'. They advised us to speak to the IDF for further details – but when we tried we were referred back to the Ministry of Defence as 'the appropriate body to speak with'. The company Modi'in Ezrachi didn't respond to us at all.

Next, we travelled to Ramallah in the West Bank to meet Iyad Haddad, a then 53-year-old field researcher with B'Tselem human rights group. We found him at his home office, in a decrepit building near a hospital. At first glance it looked like a bric-a-brac shop. But the objects on his tables were not trinkets. They included spent ammunition, tear gas canisters, sponge bullets and shell casings.

Haddad had spent the past three decades documenting acts and impacts of Israeli forces' violence here. These ugly little pieces of memorabilia were his testament to that process. Many of these weapons had been fired on peaceful demonstrators protesting against Israel's wall and new settlements.

Standing among these items, Haddad told us that it's precisely 'because the people can't recognise' the private armed guards that they had been increasingly deployed over the last decade. 'It becomes easier for them to use force when they want to, without accountability.'

Companies initially took on more mundane operations like logistics, transportation and catering, he said; then, some began carrying out other military and police-like activities too. The collection of munitions around us, in his unusual office, would be powerful props for what he would tell us next. He believed that businesses' increasing role in Israel's occupation was not only a strategy to further shirk accountability for abuses, but that it was also a way to 'test' new weapons on Palestinians before exporting them worldwide.

'Sometimes they are using us so they can know how to use each kind of weapon', Haddad said, disapproving of demonstrations that provided these opportunities. 'For me, these kinds of activities by the Palestinians become helpful to the Israelis because it makes this area into a laboratory to test their weapons, to develop them and make it a commercial industry, to sell them to other countries.'

He spoke calmly, but we could hear weariness in his voice. 'I have seen how they are developing their tools and their weapons industry and the ways of dealing with the community', he told us. 'And, in 30 years, I never heard once that there is any kind of accountability', when abuses happen. But he goes on.

While in Ramallah, we also met Abdallah Abu Rahmah, coordinator of a local Popular Struggle Committee. Every Friday for a decade, he and his neighbours had protested against Israel's occupation. He also told us he'd heard that military companies advertise to buyers how their products had been used.

'Things like skunk water, they used it the first time in our village', he said as an example, referring to a putrid liquid that was sprayed at protesters to get them to disperse. 'Sometimes they come to our actions and they take video and photographs showing how effective the weapons are in stopping the action.'

Later, Neve Gordon, a politics professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, would also tell us: 'The laboratory of the occupied territories is where things can be fine-tuned, they can be tested, and retested … They can say, "Hey this was used by the IDF, this must be good." And that helps the marketing of the goods'.

We asked a retired Israeli brigadier general, Shlomo Brom, then at the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv, about this. Was it true that Israeli companies used the fact that their weapons had been tested on Palestinians to gain new business? 'Of course', he replied. 'Why not? Marketing professionals … if they can use the advantage that this system was tested operationally and it worked, they will.'

Many people told us that the privatisation of Israel's occupation – at checkpoints, in settlements and elsewhere – had become increasingly obvious over the last decade in particular, since the 2000–5 Second Intifada uprising of Palestinians. But seeing this as a 'new' trend wasn't quite accurate, we'd also learn.

From its founding in 1948 until the Six-Day War in 1967, Israel had been supported by much of the global left, which saw it as a socialist nation. While Palestinians in the territories it conquered were subject to military rule, Israel built up a welfare state and had low levels of inequality internally.

Shir Hever, author of The Political Economy of Israel's Occupation, described how right-wing governments then began dismantling this welfare state.

'In 1985, as the World Bank and the IMF imposed "structural adjustment plans" on developing countries,' he told us, 'the Israeli government voluntarily adopted such a plan.' This 'was a transformative moment in the country's economy, marking the shift from a social-democratic, planned market into a neoliberal one', he said. It echoed moves by Ronald Reagan in the US and Margaret Thatcher in the UK.

All sectors would be touched by privatisation, including health and education services. The gap between rich and poor Israelis widened.[7] In 2016, one-third of children lived below the poverty line.[8] Israeli academic Daniel Gutwein said: 'Israel's ethos of social solidarity has been replaced by an ethos of privatisation'.[9]

Hever told us that privatisation of the defense sector began 'with the sale of factories out of government-owned arms companies, later with massive outsourcing of security operations to private companies.' These trends, he said, 'were driven by investors who used neoliberal ideology to claim that the government was inefficient.'

Companies that benefited include Magal Security Systems, which had surrounded Gaza with fencing. Elsewhere, it had assisted in the construction of a barrier along the Egyptian and Jordanian borders, and it was bidding to build a border wall to protect Kenyans from Al-Shabaab terrorist attacks. The head of that company, Saar Koursh, told Bloomberg that 'business was down, but then came ISIS and the Syrian conflict. The world is changing, and borders are coming back big-time'.[10]

Privatising Fortress Europe

Closer to home, we saw how private companies were also increasingly involved in the border business amid Europe's widely reported 'migration crisis'.

More than 1 million people arrived by boats in 2015 and more than 230,000 in the first six months of 2016.[11] Others came over land, walking and getting lifts in cars, buses and trucks. On the Italy-France border, we met some of these people, including Alma (a pseudonym), from Palestine. We met her in Ventimiglia, a seaside city on the Italian Riviera, which had become home to a growing number of migrants incongruously 'stuck' in a place that attracts leagues of tourists every year. Its beaches no longer seemed like relaxing places; they had become sites of confrontations between migrants and police.

We met Alma in the courtyard of a church which had opened its doors to migrants who were women and children. Men slept on the streets or in a dreary camp run by the Red Cross, sealed off by gates and high fences. This divided families and, in some cases, left young children unaccompanied.

Alma was 30 years old then, and instantly relatable. She had dreams but also a plan. She had crossed Egypt and Libya before the Mediterranean to get here. She had friends in Belgium she was determined to reach.

Journeys such as hers had become increasingly risky. France had instituted heavier controls at the border. Italy was transferring people caught to 'reception centres' in southern Italy and the island of Sardinia.

Tommaso Fabbri, head of mission for Médecins Sans Frontières in Italy, told us that the situation at the Italy-French border was 'a sign that Europe's response is completely failing'. He called it an 'irresponsible decision to close the border' and push people to follow 'new routes which are often much more dangerous'.

Maurizio Mauro, head of the Ventimiglia branch of the Catholic NGO Caritas, said he had personally seen migrants coming back from the French border with injuries 'either because they fell while running, breaking their ankles or their legs, or other cases of people with signs of beatings' from border guards.

The result of a strategy of deterrents and controls, warned humanitarian charities, wouldn't stop people from moving. 'I don't want to stay here', Alma from Palestine had also told us firmly. She'd already been caught by French police after crossing the border, and sent back to Italy. Yet she would try again.

It was called Europe's worst refugee crisis since the Second World War. Refugee camps were set up across the continent. People died as states introduced restrictions, and 'push back' operations.

The Europol agency said that tens of thousands of people smugglers, more than 60 per cent of whom came from European countries, were benefiting from 'a booming business' worth billions of euros a year.[12] But trying to block people's movements also seemed like a huge business opportunity for some private companies.

Internationally, the 'migration security market' had boomed since the 11 September 2001 terrorist attacks in the US, according to researchers at the Transnational Institute in Amsterdam. They estimated that this market could almost double in size between 2015 and 2022, reaching a value of almost €30 billion.[13]

Companies were involved in erecting the visible, physical infrastructure of restrictive migration policies (from fences, walls and barbed wire to watchtowers) as well as in the roll out of new technology (including drones, satellites, heartbeat detectors, infrared cameras) to monitor and control migrants.

Across the continent, money was also being made running immigrant detention centres, assisting in deportations, managing shelters for asylum seekers. The problem wasn't just about profiting from crises – it was also about the extent to which private interests were involved in shaping and prolonging them.

Business behind bars

In Turin, northern Italy, a company called Gepsa had recently entered the immigrant detention business. It was part of a for-profit consortium managing what was called a centro d'identificazione ed espulsione ('centre of identification and expulsion', or CIE).

Gepsa was a French company that specialized in managing services at the 'most sensitive sites' requiring 'discretion' – like prisons, detention centres and government defense facilities.[14] In France, it had contracts in at least thirteen prisons. It also seemed to be expanding internationally – including into Italy.

We had never heard of this company before. But we learned that it was part of a much bigger corporate empire. It was a subsidiary of ENGIE Cofely, in turn a subsidiary of Engie – a massive multinational company.

Engie had been created in 2008 by the merger of Gaz de France and Suez (whose history could be traced back to the nineteenth-century company that built the Suez Canal). Its 2018 annual revenues surpassed $60 billion[15] – rivalling the GDPs of more than 100 countries, including Luxembourg and Uruguay. It sold electricity around the world, and was best-known for energy activities. But through its subsidiary it was also involved in the detention industry.

Across Italy, CIE centres held people detained for not having their papers in order, while they waited to be identified and then, if possible, deported. Conditions were prison-like, complete with cells and barbed wire. In Turin, the facility that Gepsa was involved in managing was in a former military barracks. Graffiti on its high concrete walls, topped with surveillance cameras, reflected how controversial it seemed to be locally. They said 'fuoco ai cie' (fire to CIE), and 'solidarietà coi prigionieri in rivolta' (solidarity with prisoners in revolt).

Over the years, there had been numerous protests inside this centre, by detainees from Africa to Latin America. Fires set during these revolts had damaged the facility and reduced its capacity.[16]

Since the late 1990s, it had been run by the Red Cross. Then, in 2015, the for-profit consortium including Gepsa took over. The contract they had signed specified that the facility had space to house 180 people – and guaranteed that its managers would be paid for at least 90 even if numbers fell below that.[17] This secured their revenues even if riots or fires caused damage again.

It was a big deal, signed by Gepsa along with an Italian contractor called Acuarinto – worth millions of euros a year. The pair had also won similar contracts to manage other such centres in Milan and in the capital Rome.[18]

Human rights groups said this trade had been a disaster for detainees. Marco Zanchetta at an NGO called Medici per i diritti umani (Doctors for Human Rights) told us that contracts were awarded to the lowest bidders, ensuring that 'who offers less wins', and leading to cuts to services.

'Before there were recreational activities, exercise courses, activities with dogs, projections of films,' he said, giving examples of things that became 'totally absent'. There was little respite for 'the tension and the psychological suffering … that comes from the uncertainty of the situations of the people who are inside', he continued, while healthcare services were also worryingly thin.

A major problem, Zanchetta explained, was that 'while there is a national health service that comes into the prisons, and is in charge of the health of the detainees, in the C.I.E health workers are dependent on the centre's contractors'.

He told us about the cases of two men from Tunisia whom his NGO had met during a visit to the Turin centre. One was suicidal, and given anti-anxiety medication without the appropriate visits with psychiatrists or specialists. The other was detained and then deported with multiple untreated fractures to one of his legs.

Later, we met a former detainee in this centre, who shared his own first-hand experience of life inside it. Omabunde, from Nigeria, told us over coffee that he had lived and worked in Italy for years and had been about to get married to a Nigerian woman who had Italian citizenship. He had legal residence papers, he said, but they had fallen out of date and he had been stopped by police while waiting for renewed copies. They put him into the system.

The Gepsa consortium had just taken over, and Omabunde said it was a major topic of conversation among detainees who claimed the new managers had made their bad situations even worse. In line with the new managers' bid that promised cost savings, he described complaints of fewer activities and services as well as increasingly unappetizing mush served at meals.

Detentions in these centres were supposed to be temporary, until people were identified and deported to their home countries. In many cases people ended up being released with orders to leave the country. Some people would go through this several times. Omabunde described a punitive system – locking people up but failing to deport them, releasing them only to maybe lock them up again later and restart the cycle. It kept people on edge, and vulnerable.

An endless churn of detainees however seemed to work just fine for some: for-profit contractors who made money off each head. Meanwhile these centres had become increasingly secretive places under private management, and harder for human rights monitors and journalists to access.

North of Turin, we drove towards the Alps until we saw abandoned factory after abandoned factory. This pocket of northern Italy had been for much of the twentieth century a major hub of the country's textile industry. It was the home of Ermenegildo Zegna, the luxury menswear brand, and the Fila brothers' first factory. Most of this activity was now long gone, however, relocated to other parts of Italy and abroad. Many people had left too.

But now a new business was opening up – that of housing asylum seekers who had to live in temporary centres while awaiting the results of their asylum applications. Across Italy, there were about 100,000 people in this system.[19] With contractors receiving €30–35 per day per person – we did the math – it was an industry worth more than €1 billion a year.

Some contractors ran large shelters in major cities like Rome or Milan. But many asylum-seekers were sent to 'hard-to-reach places, where residents are cut off from normal life', a Medecins sans Frontieres (MSF) report had warned, 'causing a strong feeling of marginalisation and a lack of access to services'.[20] For contractors, such remote locations could limit their costs – but also the level of scrutiny they received.

'I didn't know where I was going, they didn't tell us anything', said Samuel, a 30-year-old from Ghana who we met near a church in one tiny town in the foothills of the Alps. He lived in an asylum-seeker shelter nearby along with dozens of other men from different countries. Sitting along a shallow river and near a row of abandoned buildings, the structure had been recently repainted in bright colours. But it was far from a hospital and most other services. The closest supermarket was a 45-minute walk away, along winding roads without sidewalks or street lamps.

'We haven't seen the manager of the place and the workers don't know anything', Samuel also told us. 'There hasn't even been a meeting so we could ask things. We only eat and sleep.' He said he received a €15 mobile phone top up card when he arrived, but little else since then. 'We don't have clothes, or medical care', he said. 'We were facing consequences in Africa, but here too it is not easy.'

Also near the church, we met local town residents who were organizing donations of clothing and shoes for asylum seekers, as well as free language classes. These initiatives also seemed to reflect the cutting of corners by contractors – who, beyond physical shelter, were supposed to provide such things and services, as well as small amounts of 'pocket money' to buy things like phone credit from local shops.

We heard many stories of 'pocket money' that arrived late (or never did), as well as those of shelters in which basic utilities had been cut off. Some asylum-seekers had no heat or hot water for days in January. Volunteers were trying to push the local government, which had awarded the contracts, to do something about these situations. One told us that their efforts seemed to have some impact. 'Things have changed a bit. But I expected more', she said, 'Every time we have to push, and then the contractor does the minimum'.

In another small town we met Daniel, who said he needed to see a doctor urgently, about an injury he had sustained in Libya. 'Before we didn't even get soap and toothpaste … It is better now because of volunteers who help us', he told us. Though it had been a month, he said, since he'd submitted a written request to see a doctor (following many verbal pleas). 'We get no medical help, no legal assistance.'

We tried, but largely failed, to get answers from the contractors that ran these shelters. An employee at one of them, however, told us he was aware that there had been 'difficulties … especially with pocket money' that 'would be foolish to deny'. He also acknowledged that there had been 'imperfect collaboration with local volunteer associations … when you throw yourself into the community's territory, if you don't know how to introduce yourself, if you don't talk, of course you can create tensions'.

As with contracts for immigrant detention centres like the one we'd seen in Turin, the shelter business seemed to fuel a race to the bottom in terms of the services provided, with deals going to bidders who offered the cheapest prices.

For the state, outsourcing appeared to let it wash its hands of what happened next. A template we saw, for contractors' agreements to run asylum-seeker shelters, said that state offices would be 'excluded from any responsibility coming from damage to the goods or people that could happen'. Contractors were in charge, and shielded by commercial confidentiality clauses.

It thus became harder to independently scrutinize these systems, let alone hold them accountable. It wasn't only an issue in Italy, and it even affected officials like Louis Joiet. Regarding one Australian detention centre contract, which he tried to access while he was UN rapporteur on arbitrary detention, he said he was told 'it was a business secret … the state was just the same as an ordinary commercial customer, and the UN an institution that [they] feared would disclose the trade secrets used to manufacture [their] "merchandise" to the competition'.[21]

Chapter 19
Private protection

Follow the weapons

From Turin we travelled east – past Milan and the Lake Como area that was famous for hosting the vacation houses of celebrities like George Clooney. Outlet shops selling iron pots and pans, and gun stores, appeared on the side of the road. It meant we were getting closer to our destination: the de-facto capital of Italy's weapons-making district.

We arrived in Gardone Val Trompia (population 12,000), in the province of Brescia, on a Saturday morning with Giorgio Ghiglione, an Italian journalist who we'd teamed up with. Its sleepy streets were lined with stores selling guns produced by big companies as well as local artisans. The town's coat of arms displayed two rifles.

'Because we were born here and grew up here, we're used to having guns around', one young woman who we met in town told us. 'You realise that it is a strange place to live only when you leave … in many cases these weapons kill people.' She hoped the area's economy would diversify, including into tourism, but thought 'we will always be a weapons-making valley. It's too rooted in history'.

At a small cafe, another woman told us that, in the past, owning an impressive gun was a local status symbol 'like an iPhone today'. As the valley's factories boomed in the twentieth century, she added, 'we didn't know what unemployment was'. Since then times had changed. 'Some factories have moved overseas, others have closed', she said. Although there was an exception.

One company that had been intertwined with this town's history and its fortunes for hundreds of years – that had outlasted kings and governments – seemed to stand firm. This was the Beretta family dynasty – and if you worked for them, the woman in the cafe told us, your situation was comparatively 'privileged'.

There were signs everywhere in Gardone of its most famous family, the Beretta gunmakers. They seemed to own the town's most dominant buildings, and were its biggest employer. A steady stream of workers flowed in and out of its factory complex, as shifts ended but production didn't. But no one we spoke to had ever met, or even seen, any of the family members in person. They seemed everywhere, but also nowhere.

This family company was older than most states. Its history seemed to offer us a unique window into who controls the guns in our world, and how that's changed.

In the sixteenth century, Beretta had made precursors to muskets called arquebus barrels.[1] At that time, Italian city states had become reliant on private military forces. Machiavelli had called these mercenaries 'the whores of war' in his classic treatise 'The Prince', which was first published in 1532.[2] That was less than a decade after Beretta's first known contract, in 1526, with Venice.[3]

Machiavelli had urged leaders to rely on their own armies, loyal only to them, rather than mercenaries who were not to be trusted. As state militaries grew, they became major clients for Beretta. It made guns for Napoleon, King Henry VIII, and boomed with orders from the Italian army during the First and Second World Wars.[4]

Beretta still made weapons for police and militaries around the world. In 2017, for example, it secured a deal to supply 150,000 rifles and pistols to Argentina's army.[5] But the company also changed and expanded, in many ways. Family members became corporate executives overseeing a global empire with dozens of subsidiaries – including in Germany, Australia, Russia, Turkey and the UK.[6] One made 'distraction and smoke grenades and other pyrotechnic devices'.[7] Others made optics, scopes and binoculars, 'laser aiming devices and tactical flashlights'.[8] Beretta had also opened clothing and home accessories lines, on sale at places like Harrods in London.[9]

Overall, 95 per cent of the company's business was now outside of Italy. In 2015, the overarching Beretta Holdings company reported €660 million in revenues – more than half of which (€385 million) came from North America.[10] It had seen a 'decrease in orders' from military and police – however its trade in 'light firearms' to private customers seemed to have more than made up the difference, and now comprised 70 per cent of its sales.[11]

The declining position of states in Beretta's client list seemed to reflect wider trends. In Geneva, a project called the Small Arms Survey had estimated that out of 875 million firearms worldwide, about 650 million were in civilian hands (legally or illegally).[12] New guns, it described, were 'often developed for military use, then adapted to the civilian market'.[13]

This sounded like the Italian company. In 1985, it won a landmark contract to supply pistols to the US military. Not long after, a similar 'civilian' gun appeared in stores. More recently, a $525 semi-automatic pistol was shipped to US stores.[14] The company said it was 'designed specifically for military and law enforcement' and would 'make sure you #WintheFight'.[15]

The US non-profit the Violence Policy Centre said 'the US civilian handgun market' was in fact 'revolutionised and militarised, in large part because of a deliberate, well-documented marketing strategy by Beretta's management'.[16] They pointed, for example, to a 1993 Baltimore Sun interview with a Beretta executive who reportedly explained that the strategy was to use military sales to become more well-known and able, to expand in the even bigger consumer market.[17]

In Italy, observers of the gun trade said there was not enough transparency around this business – and warned that 'civilian' guns were less strictly regulated than military exports. Researchers at a group called the Permanent Observatory on Small Arms (Opal) in Brescia had been following these trends. They noticed how, for instance, an unusual amount of hunting guns had been imported by Albania in the 1990s, during the civil war in neighbouring Kosovo, and said they were suspected to have been used in the conflict.

They had also raised concerns about a 2009 export of 'civilian' guns including semi-automatics to Libya, which they said 'highlighted weaknesses in the EU's arms control regime and the dangers of selling guns to difficult countries'.[18] These weapons had been bought by Gaddafi's General People's Committee for General Security but they had been marked as 'non-military items'. This meant that necessary permits were issued in Brescia instead of by the national government in Rome, with different and potentially less scrutiny.

In the US, Beretta guns had been reportedly used in murders and fatal shootings including that of a toddler in the US state of Virginia,[19] two teenage sisters in Ohio,[20] a mother-of-four in Georgia[21] and four students at a Washington State high school.[22]

Less well known, it seemed, was how the company was involved in creating the opportunities for its profit-making. Beretta family members also belonged to the NRA's Golden Ring of Freedom and had donated millions of dollars to the group, including to 'argue significant legal issues relating to the right to keep and bear arms'.[23]

The company also closed a factory in the state of Maryland – moving to Tennessee, in response to a gun control law it didn't like.[24] Nodding to Beretta's very long history, an executive said at that time that when picking a factory location, it considers 'the possibility that we will be … [there] for decades, if not hundreds of years'.[25]

Cattle in a camp

Returning to London, at the airport we saw some of the more than half a million people globally who worked for G4S – one of the world's largest private employers.[26] Headquartered in London, this company provided guards at airports as well as in prisons and had been the subject of numerous scandals – over the treatment of its own workers as well as detainees. In 2016, it had been in the news because one of its guards was behind one of the worst mass-shooting incidents in US history[27] – at the Pulse gay club in Orlando, Florida – and because of riots at a prison that it ran in Birmingham, in the UK.[28]

G4S was also involved in the outsourced management of immigrant detention facilities, including at Yarl's Wood north of London, which held 410 mostly women detainees and had been the site of regular protests. Despite the public attention these protests had received, it was hard for journalists as well as rights advocates to get access to information and people inside. Natasha Walter at the NGO Women for Refugee Women described an 'extremely concerning' lack of transparency, arguing: 'It seems straightforward logic that if private companies are doing the work of the Home Office and being paid out of tax receipts, then they should be liable to the same scrutiny as the public sector'.

We weren't able to go inside this detention centre officially as journalists – and we weren't alone in trying and failing. A UN special rapporteur had also been denied entry, as had Diane Abbott, Labour's shadow home secretary at the time.[29] But rights advocates eventually managed to help us visit one detainee, a woman who was nearing three years inside without charge. She told us she wasn't surprised that journalists couldn't easily enter the centre – as it fit a pattern of restrictions on information as well as ever-present surveillance.

'I feel intimidated,' she said. 'We know they are listening to our phones. We feel they look at our emails as well. I feel spied upon.' This feeling, of constantly being controlled and watched, has meant that 'people are scared of speaking out.' She continued: 'I feel there should be a place you can complain,' she said, about the contractors if they cross a line. Instead: 'We are treated like cattle in a camp'.

G4S was a big player in this industry. It was a massive multinational which boasted 2016 revenues of £6.8 billion and profits of £454 million.[30] It was also an old company, with origins in a guarding business founded in Copenhagen, Denmark in 1901.[31] Though it wasn't the only such business.

The global private security market – from guards to alarm monitoring, armoured transport and other services for commercial, government and individual buyers – was now worth an estimated $180 billion, and was projected to grow to $240 billion by 2020 according to the Freedonia Group market research firm.[32]

In a 2010 book called Security beyond the State, two University of Ottawa professors had described how the provision of security had become increasingly 'de-territorialised', independent of states and 'embedded in a complex transnational architecture'.[33] They described something we had seen around the world – from Myanmar's chaotic commercial capital, where guards blocked entrances to luxury hotels that towered over the extreme poverty around them, to South Africa's wealthy suburbs, where dogs barked at us from behind high walls topped with razor wire.

The privatisation of 'everyday security', these academics said, had become so common that it often went unnoticed and unquestioned. However, they argued, it affected the distribution of power in societies (determining who gets secured and how) as well as the stability of states (fracturing their monopoly on the use of force).

'You stop noticing it – there are guards everywhere', Rita Abrahamson, one of the authors, told us over the phone. Though the expansion of private guards, security fences and gates, she said, are 'very physical displays of inequality'.

She'd looked in-depth at these trends, and their consequences in several African countries where there had been 'very little attempt to regulate the private security sector', perhaps because it created some jobs for people in contexts of high unemployment. A few governments, including Sierra Leone's, even facilitated the export of private security labour overseas, actively supporting the international industry's recruitment of their citizens.

She described these trends as frontier concerns for democracies and states, and prompted more questions: What does it mean when security becomes a product that only those with money can buy? Are there any exceptions to these trends? And how did they connect to the other international systems and strategies we had investigated?

We began to build another global dataset – recording statistics and estimates, wherever we could find them, of the number of private security workers in different countries. We then added a column to record the figures we could find on the number of public police officers by country. We wanted to see how these figures compared. Was it true, across the world, that 'everyday security' had become increasingly privatised? To what extent?

The Geneva-based Small Arms Survey had published one of the few international studies and datasets on this industry, in 2011, estimating that there were approximately 19.5 million private guards across seventy countries. It had also warned: 'Like other commercial services, only those who are able and willing to pay will benefit from it. This dynamic runs the risk of exacerbating disparities between the wealthy – protected by increasingly sophisticated systems – and the poorest, who may need to resort to informal and sometimes illegal means to secure their safety'.[34]

This industry's rapid growth had 'outpaced regulation and oversight mechanisms', that group added. There was an international code of conduct – but it was voluntary, and non-binding.[35]

We pulled together data from several sources, including from these researchers in Switzerland, the Organization for American States, the Confederation of European Security Services (CoESS), the Eurostat statistics department, and some national-level agencies. In the end, we could only find numbers for eighty-one countries (less than half of the world's states). There were other challenges too. We found few estimates of unregistered, informal or 'black market' security guards. It wasn't always easy to compare data across countries and years, as it wasn't always collected in the same way.

Still, what our spreadsheet showed us was staggering. More than half of the world's people lived in the dozens of countries – including Australia, China, the UK and US – where there seemed to be more private guards hired to protect specific people, places and things than police officers who at least in principle have a mandate to protect the public.

In the US, department of labour statistics said there were more than 1.1 million private security guards – compared with about 660,000 police and sheriff's officers. Economists Samuel Bowles and Arjun Jayadev had also looked at these figures and found that the US was employing 'as many private security guards as high school teachers'.[36] They further found that more unequal cities and states had higher levels of 'guard labour' – a broad term they used to include private security as well as police, bailiffs, prison officers and other related workers.

We rang Jayadev in Bangalore, where he was teaching at Azim Premji University. The growth of the private security industry reflects the 'breakdown of trust and community bonds' that comes with rising inequality, he told us.

In India, estimates suggested the private security industry employed as many as 7 million people.[37] This was far more than the 1.7 million police officers it had in 2013.[38] In that country, Jayadev told us, this industry's growth was also part of a broader 'secession of the rich from the rest of the economy', which included relying on 'private services in every facet of their lives', to provide 'all of the things the state might otherwise … including security'.

Informal imperialism

It is 'extremely difficult', wrote other academics from the University of Leicester in the UK, 'to grasp either the activities or the true scale' of this industry due to a 'veil of secrecy around its activities that is only occasionally lifted'. They connected what they called 'the re-emergence of mercenary forces … re-imagined as Private Security Companies' to 'the growing strength of (neo)liberal imperialism'. Broader outsourcing drives, they said, had 'laid the foundations' for a '(re-)privatisation of the military'.[39]

Like other international systems and trends we'd investigated, modern private military and security companies also seemed to have boomed in the decades of 'decolonization', as independence and anti-colonial movements rose and Europe's formal empires fell. From the 1960s, numerous new private contractors were founded by British special forces veterans, with names like Watchguard International and Control Risks Group.

Such companies boomed again at the end of the Cold War, as millions of people left state militaries and looked for new jobs – and then again with US-led wars in the Middle East, and rising levels of income inequality.

If 'you have a ton more money than everyone around you … you want to protect it. Getting security from the private sector is an obvious way to do it', said Deborah Avant, co-director of the University of Denver's Private Security Monitor programme. During the US-led wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, 'an army of private workers flooded in to do all sorts of things', she told us. Many did jobs that would have previously been done by the military directly. Among those recruited were former child soldiers from Uganda.[40] Afterwards, many stayed in this line of business.

But, as the Leicester academics suggested, the world has seen privatised security before. Some 'chartered corporations' that had expanded European colonial empires had their own security, for instance. Famously, in 1857 the East India Company's forces rose up against their employer. The company publicly executed tens of thousands of suspected rebels in retaliation. (A few years after this, it was out of power and the British crown took over, giving a new title to Queen Victoria: Empress of India.)[41]

'Mercenary forces reinforced empire on the cheap', summarized P. W. Singer, at the Brookings Institution think tank. It was only during the First World War, he explained, that 'the nature of warfare had changed to the point whereby mercenary forces became irrelevant'. That was a period in which state militaries expanded dramatically. It was during this time and in this context that Weber, the German sociologist, had written that a monopoly over the legitimate use of force, within certain territories, were defining characteristics of the state.[42]

That context had changed. Private companies had become increasingly involved (or re-involved) in all phases of warfare including training and arming soldiers, intelligence gathering and strategic advice. They could be hired to battle in civil wars, against rebel groups, insurgents, even protestors. Singer called them 'corporate warriors'. With their growth, he said, 'the start of the twenty-first century is witnessing the gradual breakdown of the Weberian monopoly over the forms of violence'.[43]

Companies in the privatised security business often worked for states. But they could have many clients at the same time – and could also work for other private companies and wealthy individuals. According to Catherine Piana, director general of the Confederation of European Security Services (CoESS) industry group, roughly 70 per cent of private security clients in Europe were other businesses – not states or government agencies.

'There is now a very wide range of services, depending of course on who you are,' Piana added. Amid threats from terrorism, for example, guards 'often have positions in front of buildings where they can see unusual activities and report them, so there's a possibility for them to collect information too'.

Singer, at the Brookings Institution, wrote that this industry also gave criminal enterprises that purchased these services 'new options and new paths to power not imagined until very recently'. He speculated that 'states may eventually become like dinosaurs toward the end of the Cretaceous period: powerful but cumbersome, not yet superseded, but no longer the unchallenged masters of their environment'.[44]

Even in the 1970s, academics including political theorist Hedley Bull were predicting the rise of 'neomedievalism' – the emergence of non-state actors and the overlapping of their authority with that of governments.[45] In 2014, Sean McFate published a more contemporary, non-academic account of the same thing.

The Modern Mercenary, written by the former contractor at the private security giant Dyncorp, described how that company had been contracted by the US State Department to design, recruit and train Liberia's new army after that country's civil war. McFate said this marked 'the first time in two centuries that one sovereign nation hired a private enterprise to raise another sovereign nation's armed forces'.[46]

He also described the rise of a 'neo-medieval' world, where private forces determine the outcomes of conflicts in 'a non-state-centric, multipolar international system of overlapping authorities and allegiances'. And, like Staley the Chicago economist who seemed to have predicted much of what we saw around the world, he suggested it would be futile to try to stop this.

The new nanny

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the UN's General Assembly in 1948, says that 'everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person', and that 'no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property'.[47] Governments are required to work towards realizing these rights.

But when security is privatised, only those with enough money can buy it. What does it mean for democracy, we asked, when this happens?

In some countries the expansion of the private security industry had enabled the richest and even the middle classes to bypass the state. In Latin America, the UN Development Programme had called it a trend that 'further increases inequality, as social groups have different capacities to deal with crime'.[48] It seemed to be a cause as well as a product of intensifying inequalities.

The elite US magazine Town & Country in 2016 meanwhile said that 'in properly staffed households throughout the world, the bodyguard is the new nanny'. It described how 'fear of terrorism, a volatile political climate and a pervasive sense that the wealth creation of a few has come at the expense of the many have made paranoia the norm'.[49]

Several companies explicitly marketed their services to the richest including crisis response, 'executive personal protection', and security for mega-yachts. One of them, Pinkerton, claimed a stunning 170 years of experience with 'highly-skilled agents' protecting 'Fortune 100 CEOs and their workforces, famous entertainers, athletes, high-net worth individuals, royal families and diplomats'.[50]

The privatisation of security was also affecting the UK, where we lived. Data collected by the CoESS industry group said there were 232,000 private security guards in the country in 2015, again far exceeding numbers of police officers. The British Security Industry Association estimated that this market was worth more than £6 billion.[51] Customers included local communities: residents in one Essex town, for example, reportedly hired private security to patrol its public streets at night after its local police station closed.[52]

Other companies focused on elite clientele included a 'My Local Bobby' subscription-based service which catered to residents of London's most upmarket neighbourhoods. One of its founders, a former police officer, said: 'It's like people buy private health insurance … the concept of people paying for something above what the state provides – this is no different'.[53] Another London-based company, Westminster Security, said that it offered 'complete security and lifestyle management for high net-worth individuals, families and businesses'. It also advertised that its employees had police and military backgrounds.[54]

Also in the UK, we found more than a dozen private security and military companies based in Hereford, close to the British Army's Special Air Service (SAS) headquarters. It also seemed like an attractive location for them because office space was cheap and readily available near huge expanses of countryside, ideal for training centres and courses.

In the nearby sleepy village of Madley, population 1,200, we found one of these training centres. Behind an idyllic rural setting, with a Red Lion pub, parish church, and many grazing cows in fields, was a converted barn. While it looked like any other barn from the outside, inside was military equipment.

Every six weeks, we learned, this building and the area around it were filled with prospective recruits for this industry. They came from various places including in Eastern Europe, the US and Latin America. It was where some of the next generation of guns for hires – guarding VIPs to corporate assets – started their journey.

'In 2004 I jacked in Iraq and came back to the UK, and threw all my money into creating Ronin Concepts,' John Geddes told us, about the private military company that he set up in 2004. He had a military career in the parachute regiment and the SAS, before going to Iraq as a private soldier with a British company. There, he was disillusioned with the quality of other recruits and he saw an opportunity to move into training.

Inside his barn, sub machine guns, rifles and pistols lined the back wall. Human dummies and severed plastic heads lay on the floor. Geddes showed us the projection screen where he put on course videos, including those of live fire training from Poland and the US (where he had other training sites). Replacing a gun on the wall rack, he shared his perspective on the success of the UK, and Hereford in particular, in this multibillion dollar industry.

'The answer goes back in history a couple of hundred years when you had in the days of the rise of the East India Company,' he said, naming that famous colonial-era 'chartered company' which 'occupied huge tracts of the globe and mostly they were ex-services patched throughout the empire.'

In 2014, a UK Ministry of Defence research report predicted the rise of corporate armies, drone terrorism and laser weapons among threats to security to emerge internationally over the next thirty years. It sketched out a vision of the future with large multinational corporations equipped with their own 'highly capable security forces' and new technologies like increasingly cheap unmanned drones for sale to all sorts of buyers including criminals and terrorists, who may even be able to 'secure payload space on rockets operated by private companies – this would allow them to launch their own surveillance satellites'.[55]

This study did not seem far-fetched – much of what it described was already in motion, and had been for a long time. Around the world, private guards were common sights at locations from airports to oil refineries. Once again, most weapons were in private hands. And British companies were at the forefront of this industry, selling security and profiting from the threat of violence worldwide.

Chapter 20
Lucrative threats

Secret city

We arrived in Albuquerque after the sun had set, and met Brooks Saucedo-McQuade, a photojournalist who would accompany us to our last destination.

Together, we drove north through stunning scenery with small bushes popping through sand and giant rocky ridges beyond them. It was sunny with few clouds. This was the land evoked by New Mexico's tagline – the 'Land of Enchantment' – and that had inspired Georgia O'Keeffe, who had painted here. But roadside signs, pointing to military sites, kept us on track.

We were here to go to the belly of the horrific beast that is the threat of nuclear war: Los Alamos, home of the atomic bomb. It was where, during the Second World War, an army of scientists worked on the top-secret 'Manhattan Project'. A 'secret city' was built around their laboratory, surrounded by fences and guards. They were forbidden to talk about their jobs and even the lab's existence.[1]

Now, you could drive right into the town. On a weekday afternoon, we found its streets quiet. Potted flowers hung from lamp-posts. There were landscaped gardens, a pond and many planted trees. It looked more like a wealthy ski-resort town, like Aspen, than part of the military-industrial complex. But there were reminders of bombs everywhere.

The local movie theatre was on Oppenheimer Drive, named after the physicist who oversaw the creation of the first nuclear bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. 'Atomic City Transit' buses roll down the streets. In springtime there was an 'Atomic Man Duathlon'. In the fall: a 'Meltdown Rock Climbing Competition'.

Shops sold atomic bomb souvenirs including kids' t-shirts with images of explosions and the words 'Kicking ass since 1945'. Los Alamos was increasingly marketing itself to tourists – war and military history buffs, others interested in science and technology, and those looking for unusual holidays.

The nuclear weapons lab was still running and high levels of secrecy seemed to have returned to the town, in a new, corporate form. The historic Los Alamos National Laboratory had been controversially privatised. Contractors were not only executing decisions, but they were coming up with plans and strategies too.

Los Alamos had been an unusual bubble, with issues of inequality and power part of its story, from the very start. Much of the land used to build the lab, and the 'secret city' around it, had been taken from local indigenous and Hispanic families, and never returned.[2] After the war, an entirely new county was carved out for it. On the state map it was a tiny dot. On league tables, it was up at the top as one of the wealthiest counties in the country – next to some of the poorest. Also unlike neighbouring areas, it had the state's best schools; one of the country's highest concentrations of PhDs; and one in nine residents was a millionaire.[3]

'We have ranches in this state that are bigger than Los Alamos County', said Chuck Montaño, in the dining room of his home in Santa Fe, just over 50 kilometers away. He had grown up here, and went to work at the lab as an adult – for thirty-two years.

'There's always been this friction' between the lab and local communities, he told us. 'Some of us have benefited, we've gotten jobs there … but most of the benefit is centred in Los Alamos, it stays in Los Alamos'. He continued: 'It's tiny, it's isolated, but it was set up that way, to shield it from politics of surrounding counties – it has a separate funding train, because the [federal] government provides most of it'.

Even before privatisation, the lab had many problems, Montaño said, including 'a lot of labour issues'. 'They were abusive, unnecessarily', he told us, describing how layoffs seemed to be 'an excuse to target workers that were older, that were whistleblowers, basically it was open season on workers'. The lab had also faced class action lawsuits during what the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists called 'a long season of discontent', including one such case alleging racial discrimination after most of 173 people fired in 1995 were Hispanic.[4]

Montaño described these issues, and his own experience as a whistleblower – after he found evidence of fraud in the lab's procurement department – in a 2015 book entitled Los Alamos: Secret Colony, Hidden Truths.

'It was bad then and I imagine it would be worse now', he told us. Under the lab's new for-profit private managers, data including on worker demographics became confidential – making it harder to investigate things like wage disparities. 'When it became an LLC, all of a sudden all of this information became private.'

Privatising Los Alamos

More than 10,000 people worked at the lab's massive and heavily guarded complex, which included numerous buildings across 36 square miles of land.

For decades the lab had been run by the University of California. But, under George W. Bush's presidency, it and other nuclear facilities were put up for competitive bid. Requests for proposals were written so that only private companies could bid.[5]

The argument for this change seemed to be that private managers would be more efficient, and would put an end to security and safety scandals. Frequently cited was the case of a veteran scientist named Wen Ho Lee who was arrested in 1999 and accused of illegally copying classified nuclear weapons files. His story became a national media obsession with suggestions made in the press that he had shared top-secret government information with the Chinese state. (Eventually, however, the case against him was dismissed by a judge who also apologized for how he had been treated.)[6]

The winning proposal for the Los Alamos lab's new management came from a new corporate partnership called Los Alamos National Security (LANS) LLC, led by the giant privately held and politically connected firm Bechtel. Other partners included two other companies and the University of California, the facility's previous non-profit manager.

Like many of the companies we had encountered in our investigations, Bechtel was massive. American journalist Sally Denton, who published a book about the business in 2016, called it 'so potent, and with such a global reach, that it has its own foreign policy'. By the time she finished her research, she'd concluded: 'the US government is like one public policy arm of Bechtel rather than the other way around'.[7]

Founded in 1898 by Warren A. Bechtel, the company had been in his family ever since and was still one of the largest privately-held corporations in the US.[8] Headquartered in Chicago, it had boomed off of large taxpayer-funded engineering and public infrastructure projects. Around the world it built railroads, pipelines, airports, oil refineries, giant dams and shipyards – as well as the Channel Tunnel from Britain to France. Senior figures had moved back and forth from influential positions in the US government to those high up at Bechtel. Company executives John McCone, Caspar Weinberger and George P. Shultz, had respectively become Director of the CIA, Secretary of Defence and Secretary of State.[9]

Globally, it seemed to have a dark history. Its takeover of a newly-privatised municipal water system in Cochabamba, Bolivia's third largest city – and dramatic price hikes that followed – were the trigger for the country's infamous 'water wars' dramatized in the award-winning 2010 film Even the Rain starring

Gael Garcia Bernal. It had also been a major US contractor in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.[10]

While its contract at Los Alamos was relatively new, Bechtel had been involved in atomic activities for a long time. During the Second World War, it had built infrastructure in Hanford, Washington that was also used for the secret Manhattan Project to develop the atomic bomb.[11]

It was still involved in a nuclear waste treatment plant at Hanford – and it was running other nuclear security facilities from California to Tennessee. But, privately-held, Bechtel didn't disclose as much information as publicly-traded companies with many shareholders. Everyone we spoke to in New Mexico, from local residents to employees, wanted more information about what was happening at the Los Alamos lab. But they'd have to fight to get it.

Los Alamos had become a 'corporate secret city', where 'even if you're inside, you don't know anything', said Greg Mello, at the Los Alamos Study Group, one of several small but dogged watchdog groups monitoring the lab. His home in Albuquerque doubled as an office for the group. Along walls were rows of filing cabinets storing research and campaign materials.

Mello pointed us to soaring costs and senior salaries at the lab under private management. When for-profit managers took over, their fees jumped to $80 million a year (previously they had been around $8 million a year).[12]

The lab was such a big player in the state, he suggested, that political representatives weren't responsive to concerns about it. In an adjoining room large, colourful piñatas, in the shape of local congresspeople – props for a protest – had been placed comically around a table as if in a never-ending, silent meeting.

In 2012, activists at Nuclear Watch New Mexico, another local group, had filed lawsuits under the Freedom of Information Act to obtain copies of the government's annual performance evaluations for Los Alamos. It took years but eventually documents were released showing high scores for weapons development – but worryingly low ones for management, safety and environmental impacts.[13]

While the lab was run by the university alone, annual performance reports were publicly released. Other information on salaries, budgets, spending and hiring was accessible under public records acts. But now such data was often hidden because of 'commercial confidentiality'. It was private property.

'It used to be that science drove this place and everyone knew it … Now that's gone', one long-time technical staff member at Los Alamos told an American Physical Society publication in 2010 – four years after the lab was taken over by its new for-profit managers.[14] Terry Wallace, an associate director at the lab, also acknowledged declining staff morale, saying: 'Where you have a workforce that believes "this is ours", and a new management team that appears to be dropped from outer space because it's corporate … it's difficult for the workforce.'[15]

Alongside such complaints was worrying evidence that the risks for-profit managers posed weren't hypothetical. Deadly weapons and materials were in play; some people had already been hurt.

On Valentine's Day in 2014, a drum filled with radioactive nuclear waste burst open at a disposal facility near Carlsbad, New Mexico. Much of the site – the country's only underground storage for nuclear waste – and the nearby area was contaminated. Investigators uncovered bad record keeping, lax oversight and shortcuts taken by subcontractors at the Los Alamos lab.[16]

In 2013, subcontractors for the lab had been rushing to meet deadlines to ship decades-old waste when they came across a particularly acidic batch, unsafe for transport. Lab guidelines recommended tests to determine how best to treat it. But this was time consuming. Shortcuts were taken. A mistake was made and the wrong material was added to absorb excess liquid. The result was an explosive mixture. A federal report into the incident placed the blame on Los Alamos contractors who failed to pay attention to staff concerns and 'to ensure that changes to waste treatment procedures were properly documented, reviewed and approved, and that they incorporated all environmental requirements'.[17]

The Carlsbad incident was deemed a 'first degree' performance failure, for which the Bechtel-led consortium saw its management fees reduced for the year by tens of millions of dollars as a result.[18] The cost to the taxpayer to clean up the mess was estimated to be much higher, however: more than half a billion dollars and many years of time. There had also been added costs of temporarily storing nuclear waste elsewhere. At Los Alamos, meanwhile, we heard that there could still be other drums with similar contents to that which had burst.

Other federal reports had ripped into lab managers for 'significant and long-standing nuclear safety deficiencies'.[19] A 2016 audit said that the lab 'under-categorises risk and, therefore, does not apply the appropriate level of attention to safety and health issues, including nuclear safety issues'.[20]

Then, a 2015 fire at one of the lab's power stations injured nine workers. A government report said it was the lab's worst accident in almost twenty years. It concluded that 'inadequate implementation of management controls resulted in the following human effect: an employee suffering third and fourth degree burns affecting approximately 30 per cent of his body surface and being hospitalised in excess of 30 days'. Furthermore, it said there had since been 'ineffective implementation of corrective actions' including 'weaknesses in identification and control of hazards'. In other words: it could happen again.

GOCO

It wasn't just Los Alamos. Much of the US nuclear security infrastructure had been outsourced under a 'GOCO' – Government Owned, Contractor Operated – model. Companies now ran much of it – from facilities that enriched uranium and produced plutonium to the labs and plants where bombs were designed, built and maintained, to waste disposal sites.

A small group of large firms, including Bechtel, dominated this business and were increasingly in charge of whole programmes, shaping and implementing US nuclear strategy while overseeing other subcontractors.

At the Albuquerque airport we flew into, some runways were shared with the Kirtland Air Force Base – where the Sandia National Laboratory was based. It made non-nuclear components for atomic bombs and was run by the giant defence contractor Lockheed Martin. Together with Bechtel, that company was also part of a separate consortium called Consolidated Nuclear Security (CNS) which ran a plant in Texas that assembled and disassembled nuclear weapons, and a complex in Tennessee that processed uranium. In Missouri, another facility making ignition systems and other components for nuclear bombs was run by the Honeywell corporation (that also sold consumer products like home thermostats and dehumidifiers).

Along with nationwide privatisation came cross-country concern from workers and local residents about MBA-style leadership prioritising production and profit over science and safety, while ratcheting up costs to taxpayers.

Like Los Alamos, the Lawrence Livermore lab in California, outside San Francisco, similarly researched and designed nuclear weapons, and was often seen as its sister-site. It had also been run by the University of California for decades, and was now under Lawrence Livermore National Security (LLNS) LLC, a partnership of Bechtel, other companies and the university.

On its website Bechtel said 'the contracts were separate, but the partnerships worked toward economies of scale and share best practices that benefit both laboratories'.[21] But the overlap drew criticism. Jeff Colvin, a physicist at Livermore, who had also previously worked at Los Alamos, argued that a 'key promise of privatisation – introducing "market competition" to the enterprise – was immediately dashed by selecting the same corporate entity to manage both labs'.[22] This 'new business model puts labs' science missions in jeopardy', warned Colvin, who was also a representative with the University Professional and Technical Employees (UPTE) union. He described how it had shifted the lab's focus to fewer large projects, and profit, while there was 'less tolerance for the open debate and discussion that is necessary for good science'.

When for-profit managers took over Livermore, they promised huge savings but instead the lab's costs soared. There were bruising rounds of layoffs. In 2008, 129 dismissed employees sued for age discrimination. Seven years later, the consortium agreed to pay $37 million to settle these disputes.[23]

In Washington state, the decision to bring in private managers at the Hanford nuclear waste treatment plant had also seen costs rise dramatically alongside safety and security complaints. In one case there, in 2011 a senior scientist Walter Tamosaitis raised concerns over plans to turn radioactive waste into a solid glass that could then be buried. Government officials investigated and agreed that the plans didn't meet federal safety standards. Work at Hanford was suspended in 2013, but by then Tamosaitis had been demoted and moved to a basement room. By the end of the year, he was fired.[24]

Tamosaitis had been an employee of the engineering contractor URS – later acquired by AECOM. He sued for wrongful termination and eventually won a $4.1 million settlement. (A company spokesman said then that it settled 'to avoid the cost and distraction of litigation relating to events that occurred over five years ago. The company strongly disagrees that it retaliated against him in any manner.')[25]

Meanwhile, another URS employee at Hanford, Donna Busche said in her own 2013 lawsuit she also faced retaliation after expressing safety concerns.[26]

At the Pantex Plant outside Amarillo, Texas, workers had also faced painful cuts under private management – to their health and retirement benefits. That plant, where weapons were assembled and disassembled, was key to new efforts to 'modernise' the US arsenal and build smaller, precision-guided bombs.[27]

In 2015, more than 1,000 Pantex employees went on strike for more than a month over proposals to cut their benefits. 'Whenever you work at a nuclear plant and you deal with nuclear material, the most important thing to you is going to be your medical benefits', said technician Roger Richards, during their action.[28]

A settlement was reached later that year: workers agreed to lower future pay raises in order to keep their medical coverage, sick leave and pension plans. New hires, however, would not get this same deal.[29] As elsewhere in our investigations, profit-hungry bosses seemed to be tightening the screws. In this context, there seemed to be no room for questions that had exercised citizens around the world: How do we end the threat of nuclear weapons? How can we move towards a world without them?

Collateral damage

Controversial plans to 'modernise' the US arsenal, at an estimated cost of more than $1 trillion, would be a boon to companies in the nuclear security business. These modernization plans – upgrading and adding smaller, precision-guided bombs – were part of the ideology of 'nuclear deterrence', which argued that maintaining fearsome arsenals would prevent them from being used.

It wasn't a new idea. Jacob Viner, an advisor to Eugene Staley when he was a young economist at the University of Chicago, was among the advocates of 'deterrence' during the Cold War. It had long been a controversial and much debated approach – but its proponents still included major world leaders and their advisors. Increasingly, private corporations stood to benefit.

Much of the US nuclear weapons infrastructure had already been outsourced with alarming consequences: accidents, injuries, severe retaliation against whistleblowers and record-setting spending increases. These privatisations reflected broader trends as states outsourced a widening variety of activities and responsibilities.

In late 2015 – after the radioactive waste leak at Carlsbad, and the electrical fire at Los Alamos – the Bechtel-led consortium was told that other companies would soon be able to bid for the lab's business. The competition for new managers was expected to last several years. But it had already reopened discussions on whether private management was a good idea.

Some of the people we spoke to said that problems at Los Alamos ran too deep and that the government had to step up and re-accept responsibility for it – that changing the companies involved in private management wouldn't be enough. Others pointed out that there were just a small number of companies that had amassed the experience and expertise needed to bid for contracts like these – and that many of these also had troubling records.

Meanwhile, proponents of keeping the lab in for-profit hands pointed at how New Mexico as a state, and Los Alamos as a county, benefited from tens of millions in Gross Receipts Taxes (GRT) from the consortium each year – which they hadn't received when it was under sole University of California management.[30]

Pete Sheehey, a Los Alamos County Councillor, said that when the county began receiving large amounts of lab taxes it started a programme called 'Progress through Partnering' that had supported projects like a free bus service around northern New Mexico that included stops for Native American pueblos. The lab's managers, he told us, had also been generous in supporting local education and other programmes – and it was unclear if that will continue under a new contractor, who 'will presumably be under pressure to economise'.

But, Sheehey also acknowledged, the entrance of for-profit managers at the lab 'clearly it did not save money as advocates of privatisation had hoped or claimed, and performance in some areas was judged unacceptable'.

About an hour from Los Alamos, in Espanola, Patricia Trujillo was not impressed with the community initiatives the lab had set up. She told us that they were far from enough to tackle the pervasive disparities that existed in the area.

Espanola, a small town from where many manual workers at the lab commuted, was in Rio Arriba County. It was one of the poorest parts of the state, in turn one of the poorest states in the nation, with a grim reputation for high rates of heroin overdoses.

'There's been basically no trickle down', said Trujillo, a literature and Chicano studies professor, and head of the equity and diversity programme at Northern New Mexico College in Espanola. 'This is what institutionalised racism looks like', she told us. 'We can take your land. We can poison you. We can pay you the minimum.'

Support for things like the development of science curricula for area schools 'doesn't address structural issues', she continued. 'It's still "we have the knowledge, we'll give it to you." It's still piecemeal and problematic, north-south thinking.'

We met inside a small restaurant. Outside, Trujillo pointed us to hills that still bore the scars of wildfires that had ripped through the area and threatened the lab. She remembered how, when such fires broke out, people from Los Alamos were 'literally forced out of the hill and into Espanola. People opened shelters, were really hospitable, but after those moments of crisis everyone went back to Los Alamos'.

In 2000, what was named the Cerro Grande Fire had come close to lab property, prompting an emergency push to get thousands of containers of legacy hazardous waste out of the area.[31] Another big fire came in 2011, five years into the Bechtel consortium's tenure. That Las Conchas Fire was diverted to get it away from a lab storage area – while the Santa Clara Pueblo indigenous community lost 80 per cent of its forested land.[32]

Beata Tsosie-Pena, an environmental activist with the indigenous women's organisation Tewa Women United, was born in Santa Clara. We met her later that day. She also told us that the Los Alamos lab seemed to have become less accountable under private management – but stressed that its damage now stretched back generations. The real question, she argued, is why nuclear weapons programmes continued to exist in the first place.

'It wasn't Hiroshima or Nagasaki that were first bombed, but the people of New Mexico', Pena reminded us, referring to the detonation of the very first atomic bomb at the Trinity Test Site 200 miles from Los Alamos on 16 July 1945, weeks before the more well-known bombs were dropped on Japan.

She rattled off a long list of threats still posed by the Los Alamos lab to neighbouring communities, including a plume of underground toxic hexavalent chromium – a chemical linked to higher cancer rates – that was drifting towards them. There was 'legacy waste' still in dump sites – and new waste too – above an aquifer that supplied drinking water to most of northern New Mexico.

Los Alamos needed a fundamentally new mission, Pena insisted – one that was guided by a holistic do-no-harm approach and that focused scientists' minds on solving pressing environmental challenges: not nuclear arms. For now, she said, 'I sometimes feel we are still collateral damage for the weapons industry'.

This time, because of our collaboration with the local photojournalist, we were able to bring back to Gavin striking images. When we next met we handed him printed copies, one by one, letting him see for himself the scars on the earth from fires were diverted away from the Los Alamos lab; dramatic inequalities with surrounding communities; signs announcing the lab's private managers; and the faces and home offices of activists working hard to pierce its secrecy.

'This is scary stuff,' he eventually said.

But, as always, he pushed us to consider the big questions that our investigations had raised. When we thought we were done, he wanted more.

'What do you see when you step back from the detail?' He asked 'Each of the stories you've told me is extraordinary, but what do they add up to?'

Epilogue: Ugly truths

As we learned about these corporate justice and welfare systems, and corporate utopias and armies, that have shaped our world, we felt increasingly disappointed in something else: our industry, the media.

For democracy to be meaningful, we must have a hand in shaping our destinies – and access to information we need to understand our world and inform our decisions. But what if our elected representatives don't have the power we thought they did? And what if the media has failed to let us know?

Our investigations had shown us how transnational companies and investors have been able to challenge, even overrule, various state actions – and threaten our ability to respond to existential threats like climate change and atomic war. What chance do we have, if our governments can be sued for changing energy policies, or enforcing environmental protections, that hurt corporate profits? If nuclear weapons programmes are controlled by contractors who profit from them and will never want them shut down?

The international investment treaties that enshrine the global justice system that protects corporations' profits; the global welfare system that nourishes them and helps them expand; private carve-outs like special economic zones (SEZs) that have sliced and diced our world; and corporations' control over force and security – today all of these dynamics affect countries globally.

On one side of this story are rich and powerful people and their elite advisors, lawyers and lobbyists. On the other side is the vast majority of the world's population. Those hit hardest are often those already struggling. International institutions seemed to make it clear, for example, that it wasn't a coincidence that most factory workers in these zones were women – describing them as more 'docile' and easier to control.

Overall what we uncovered was dark, and suggested that much less is up for grabs in national political debates and elections than we're led to believe – and that many of the scandals that occupy our media may actually be quite small in comparison to the silent coup that has been enacted against our democracies.

But we also saw light. Around the world – as well as in historical archives – we had met or learned about people resisting these trends, and pushing for safer, healthier and more democratic futures. Many of them had reminded us of our mentor, speaking with a similar combination of seriousness and hope.

Gavin passed away in late 2016, before we finished fully absorbing and understanding this story, but we and our work continued to be shaped by him. As we pieced together this puzzle, we realised our own perspectives on the world had changed.

We couldn't stop looking at things through the new lens we'd found. It made visible how corporations had imposed extraordinary limits on democracy. One example is how some companies have used the investor-state legal system to challenge government policies enacted to protect people amid the Covid-19 pandemic. In 2021, Chile was sued by French shareholders of a consortium controlling Santiago's international airport, demanding compensation for lost profits due to fewer flights. They also complained about policies requiring additional sanitary measures.[1]

It is hard to forget, when we now pass by a Lidl store, that this giant chain's expansion across Europe was supported by huge amounts of money from the international development system. Bananas on sale, bearing the Chiquita label, make us hesitate and question whether they were grown on lands taken over from local farmers. It's not wrong to think that things don't always add up in our societies. Something doesn't feel right because there are extremely powerful players involved in major decisions who are usually off-screen, hidden from us.

Crises of faith or lacking trust in democratic institutions from parliaments to the media make sense. Democracy and independence are largely buzzwords that feel hollow – because they were made hollow, over generations with strategic planning, lobbying campaigns and new infrastructure.

With everything at stake, the response to this silent coup against democracies around the world must match its ambition, coordination and long time horizons.

We saw in the archives how a number of primarily Latin American countries had tried, in the mid-twentieth century, to resist the establishment of the global investor-state legal system, warning that it'd threaten their independence.

Throughout our investigations, some Latin American countries continued to stand out for challenging this and other systems and trends that have expanded corporate power, as well as profits. They included El Salvador, which after battling a major investor-state case became the world's first country to ban mining nationwide.

In Argentina, meanwhile, we saw an alternative to increasingly privatised residential and work places at Hotel Bauen in Buenos Aires, one of the country's many empresas recuperadas ('recovered businesses'). After the hotel declared bankruptcy, its workers occupied and reopened it. One of these workers, then 66-year-old waiter Armando Casado, told us: 'Before it was a job like any other … now you have freedom.'

Years later we met Evo Morales, Bolivia's first indigenous president, at his home deep within the Amazon. To get there from Cochabamba, the nearest city, took four hours in the back of a minibus. Inside a nondescript house, we sat in a living room that was bare apart from two sofas. 'We established a political position with regards to transnational companies: we talk, we negotiate, but we do not submit to transnational corporations', he told us of his time in government, which oversaw unprecedented economic and poverty-reduction successes that even the World Bank praised.[2]

'The coup was against our economic model … we showed that another Bolivia is possible', Morales said, of his overthrow in 2019. British officials warmly welcomed the new regime and opportunities for UK companies to make money from the country's resources, particularly lithium which is used in batteries. Morales had tried to stop the traditional imperial dynamic of exporting raw materials to be made into industrial products elsewhere. He wanted Bolivia not just to export lithium but also to make and sell batteries.

'This is a struggle not only in Bolivia, or Latin America, but throughout the world,' he argued. 'Who do natural resources belong to? The people under the control of their state? Or are they privatised under the control of transnationals so they can plunder our natural resources?' The current millennium, he insisted, must be one 'of the people, not of monarchies, nor hierarchies, nor oligarchies. This is our struggle'.

This struggle requires undoing the systems and strategies which prevent us from shaping our own destinies. This will not happen overnight, and it will require as many people as possible to join together to boldly resist it across borders.

More battles from the frontlines must reach the headlines. Around the world we met people resisting expanding corporate empires who had tremendous knowledge about them and their impacts. In many cases we were the first journalists they had ever spoken to. Major international institutions like the World Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, headquartered in Washington DC and London respectively, must be more closely scrutinized and investigated by more journalists.

Many newspapers have correspondents focused on national supreme courts but there are few journalists that so closely cover the international investor-state tribunals that function as a global supreme court. Those that do cover it usually have their articles deposited behind the paywalls of their specialty publications for lawyers and investors. This must change and the full force of journalistic scrutiny be applied to such systems.

Gavin believed that journalism in a democratic society should comfort the afflicted, and afflict the comfortable. The mainstream media, as it stands, often inverts this and protects the powerful. We hope that by writing this book, we have stayed true to the principles that Gavin instilled in us nearly a decade ago. But – as he knew well, and often reminded us too – unless information is used by people, nothing changes.

'Above all, we have a responsibility to tell the truth', he always told us. Truth was his obsession. 'Not the respectable truth,' he'd add, 'but the ugly truth.' This book tells ugly truths, but the future can still be beautiful. That's up to all of us.

Notes

Introduction

1 'About us', The Centre for Investigative Journalism, https://tcij.org/about/who-we-are/

2 'Sarah Harrison: The woman behind whistleblowers Edward Snowden and Julian Assange', The Evening Standard (12 September 2016), https://www.standard.co.uk/lifestyle/london-life/sarah-harrison-the-woman-behind-whistblowers-edward-snowden-and-julian-assange-a3342546.html

3 'Celebrities stand with Courage, CitizenFour and more', The Courage Foundation (December 2014), https://www.couragefound.org/2014/12/december-newsletter-celebrities-stand-with-courage-citizenfour-and-more/

4 'Wikileaks reveals video showing US air crew shooting down Iraqi civilians', The Guardian (5 April 2010), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2010/apr/05/wikileaks-us-army-iraq-attack

5 'Bradley Manning's treatment was cruel and inhuman, UN torture chief rules', The Guardian (12 March 2012), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2012/mar/12/bradley-manning-cruel-inhuman-treatment-un

6 'Gavin Macfadyen (1940–2016): Why investigative journalism matters', https://www.opendemocracy.net/en/shine-a-light/gavin-macfadyen-1940-2016-why-investigative-journalism-matte/

7 'Gavin MacFadyen', IMDB, https://www.imdb.com/name/nm0532192/bio

8 Claire Provost and Felicity Lawrence, 'US food aid programme criticised as "corporate welfare" for grain giants', The Guardian (18 July 2012), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2012/jul/18/us-multinationals-control-food-aid

9 Matt Kennard, Irregular Army: How the US Military Recruited Neo-Nazis, Gang Members, and Criminals to Fight the War on Terror, Verso (2012)

10 While we did most of our reporting together, in some cases we travelled or did interviews separately. We have used 'we' throughout for ease.

Chapter 1

1 According to the OECD's Creditor Reporting System, https://stats.oecd.org/Index.aspx?DataSetCode=crs1

2 Witness statement of Thomas C. Shrake, Pacific Rim President, in Pacific Rim vs El Salvador, December 2010 http://icsidfiles.worldbank.org/icsid/ICSIDBLOBS/OnlineAwards/C661/DC4242_En.pdf, p.15–18

3 Ley de Inversiones, adoptada por Decreto Legislativo N° 732 del 14 de octubre de 1999, https://wipolex.wipo.int/en/text/339781

4 Benjamin Witte-Labhar, 'World Bank allows Canadian miner to keep pursuing El Salvador's Gold', Latin America Digital Beat (2012), https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/noticen/9983

5 'OceanaGold agrees to acquire Pacific Rim Mining', OceanaGold press release (8 October 2013), https://www.newswire.ca/news-releases/oceanagold-agrees-to-acquire-pacific-rim-mining-513072211.html

6 Pacific Rim Mining, 'Statement filed in arbitration case against El Salvador; PacRim Seeks Damages of US $315 Million', 1 April 2013

7 'OceanaGold and Pacific Rim Mining Complete Plan of Arrangement', joint press release (27 November 2013, archived 27 August 2014), https://web.archive.org/web/20140827133954/http://www.oceanagold.com/assets/Uploads/131127-13-12-OGC-PMU-Closing-of-Plan-of-Arrangement-FINAL.pdf

8 Jamie Stark, 'A corporate warning to El Salvador: give up your gold or pay $315m', PRI (1 August 2014), https://www.pri.org/stories/2014-08-01/corporate-warning-el-salvador-give-your-gold-or-pay-315-million

9 Larry Rohter, '4 Salvadorans say they killed us nuns on order of military', The New York Times (3 April 1998), https://www.nytimes.com/1998/04/03/world/4-salvadorans-say-they-killed-us-nuns-on-orders-of-military.html

10 'From madness to hope: The 12 year war in El Salvador', Report of the Commission on the Truth for El Salvador, United Nations (1993), https://undocs.org/S/25500

11 Christopher Dickey, '40 killed in San Salvador', The Washington Post (31 March 1980), https://www.washingtonpost.com/archive/politics/1980/03/31/40-killed-in-san-salvador/c8e099a1-a364-4aae-a179-e53322beb17a/

12 Chris Hufstader, 'When a radio station helps fight poverty – and speaks the truth', Oxfam America (29 November 2014), https://www.oxfamamerica.org/explore/stories/when-a-radio-station-helps-fight-povertyand-speaks-the-truth/

13 Jonathan Watts, 'One murder every hour: how El Salvador became the homicide capital of the world', The Guardian (22 August 2015)

14 Tariq Zaidi, 'El Salvador: A country ruled by gangs – a photo essay', The Guardian (22 November 2019), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2019/nov/22/el-salvador-a-nation-held-hostage-a-photo-essay

15 Sarah Bermeo, 'Violence drives immigration from Central America', Brookings (26 June 2018), https://www.brookings.edu/blog/future-development/2018/06/26/violence-drives-immigration-from-central-america/

16 'Sánchez Cerén se compromete a no explotar la minería', La Prensa Grafica (23 February 2014), https://www.laprensagrafica.com/elsalvador/Sanchez-Ceren-se-compromete-a-no-explotar-la-mineria-20140223-0026.html

17 Juan Francisco Salazar, 'Buen Vivir: South America's rethinking of the future we want', The Conversation (24 July 2015), https://theconversation.com/buen-vivir-south-americas-rethinking-of-the-future-we-want-44507

18 Luis Armando Gonzalez, 'Los ideales de Salvador Sanchez Ceren', America Latina en movimento (27 November 2018), https://www.alainet.org/es/articulo/196782

19 Ángel Ibarra, 'We will promote environmental sustainability in the country' (28 May 2014), https://www.stopesmining.org/j25/index.php/salvadoran-mining-ban/300-angel-ibarra-we-will-promote-environmental-sustainability-in-the-country

20 Ibid.

21 Heather Gies, 'Once lush, El Salvador is dangerously close to running dry', National Geographic (2 November 2018), https://www.nationalgeographic.com/environment/article/el-salvador-water-crisis-drought-climate-change

22 Cristina M. Campbell, 'Operation Sojourner: The government infiltration of the sanctuary movement in the 1980s and its legacy on the modern central American refugee crisis', University of St Thomas Law Journal (2017), https://core.ac.uk/download/pdf/217158105.pdf

23 'Award', Commerce Group Corp v. The Republic of El Salvador ICSID Case No. ARB/09/17, http://icsidfiles.worldbank.org/icsid/ICSIDBLOBS/OnlineAwards/C741/DC1971_En.pdf

24 Ibid.

25 Ed Atkins, 'The corporate nullification of the human right to water: The case of El Salvador', https://www.opendemocracy.net/en/corporate-nullification-of-human-right-to-water-case-of-el-salvador/

26 'Radio Victoria: Chronology of Threats and Actions', Doctors for Global Health website, https://www.dghonline.org/files/page_attachments/RADIO-VICTORIA-CHRONOLOGY-2011.pdf

27 'Pronunciamiento de la Procuraduría de DDHH en el 5º aniversario de las muertes de activistas ambientales contra la minería metálica' (29 December 2014), https://web.archive.org/web/20170611140528/http://voces.org.sv/2014/12/29/pronunciamiento-de-la-procuraduria-de-ddhh-en-el-5o-aniversario-de-las-muertes-de-activistas-ambientales-contra-la-mineria-metalica/

28 Award in Pacific Rim Cayman LLC vs Republic of El Salvador (14 October 2016), https://www.italaw.com/sites/default/files/case-documents/italaw7640_0.pdf

29 'El Dorado Project', OceanaGold, https://oceanagold.com/operation/closure/el-dorado-project-el-salvador/

30 Gene Palumbo and Elisabeth Malkin, 'El Salvador prizing water over gold bans all metal mining', The New York Times (29 March 2017)

Chapter 2

1 Megan R. Wilson, 'Authoritarian regimes pay millions to K street Lobbyists', Bloomberg Government (9 January 2019), https://about.bgov.com/news/authoritarian-regimes-pay-millions-k-street-lobbyists/

2 Pacific Rim represented by Crowell & Moring, ProPublica Represent database, https://projects.propublica.org/represent/lobbying/r/300953252

3 Pacific Rim represented by Otto Reich, ProPublica Represent database, https://projects.propublica.org/represent/lobbying/r/300941449

4 'Otto J. Reich, biography', http://www.ottoreich.com/Biography.html

5 Compañía de Aguas del Aconquija S.A. and Vivendi Universal S.A. v. Argentine Republic (ICSID Case No. ARB/97/3), https://icsid.worldbank.org/cases/case-database/case-detail?CaseNo=ARB/97/3

6 Vivendi v. Argentina, Investment Treaty News (18 October 2018), https://www.iisd.org/itn/en/2018/10/18/vivendi-v-argentina/

7 'About ICSID', World Bank website, https://icsid.worldbank.org/about

8 The ICSID Caseload – Statistics (Issue 2014–2), https://icsid.worldbank.org/sites/default/files/publications/Caseload%20Statistics/en/ICSID%20Web%20Stats%202014-2%20%28English%29.pdf

9 The ICSID Caseload – Statistics (Issue 2022–1), https://icsid.worldbank.org/sites/default/files/documents/The_ICSID_Caseload_Statistics.1_Edition_ENG.pdf

10 The ICSID Caseload – Statistics (Issue 2014–2), https://icsid.worldbank.org/sites/default/files/publications/Caseload%20Statistics/en/ICSID%20Web%20Stats%202014-2%20%28English%29.pdf

11 History of the ICSID Convention: Documents Concerning the Origin and the Formation of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of Other States. Documents in English. Volume II-1. International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes, p.365

12 Ibid., p.306

13 Ibid., p.308

14 Ibid., p.476

15 Ibid., p.472

16 Ibid., p.466

17 Ibid., p.608

18 Ibid., p.606

19 Robin Broad, 'Remembering the "Toko No" Fifty Years Later', Triple Crisis blog (5 December 2014), http://triplecrisis.com/remembering-the-tokyo-no-fifty-years-later/

20 Andreas F. Lowenfeld, The ICSID Convention: Origins and transformations, https://digitalcommons.law.uga.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?referer=&httpsredir=1&article=1109&context=gjicl

21 'Business & Human Rights: Achievements and Prospects' transcript of speech by John Ruggie at the Carnegie Council (28 October 2008), https://web.archive.org/web/20161114031558/http://www.policyinnovations.org/ideas/briefings/data/000089

22 'The Honorable L. Yves Fortier PC, CC, OQ, QC, Ad, E, LLD', CV on Fortier's website https://yfortier.ca/cv/Yves-Fortier-Resume-EN.pdf

23 'Daniel M. Price', Profile on Arbitration Law website https://arbitrationlaw.com/profile/daniel-m-price-0

24 'Guillermo Aguilar-Alvarez 1958–2017', Global Arbitration Review (13 July 2017), https://globalarbitrationreview.com/article/guillermo-aguilar-alvarez-1958-2017

25 'Speculating on injustice: Third-party funding of investment disputes', Corporate Europe Observatory (27 November 2012), https://corporateeurope.org/en/trade/2012/11/chapter-5-speculating-injustice-third-party-funding-investment-disputes#footnote6_a8p875f

26 'Guaracachi America Inc & Rurelec Plc v. Plurinational State of Bolivia, Statement of Claim', Permanent Court of Arbitration (2012), p.108 https://pcacases.com/web/sendAttach/506

27 'Guaracachi America Inc & Rurelec Plc v. Plurinational State of Bolivia, Award', Permanent Court of Arbitration (2014), p.208, https://pcacases.com/web/sendAttach/568

28 Burford Capital press release (3 June 2014), https://www.investegate.co.uk/burford-capital/rns/burford-receives–26m-from-innovative-investment/201406030700066471l/

Chapter 3

1 Sabine Konrad and Lisa Richman, 'Investment treaty protection for state defaults on sovereign bonds – The broader implications of Abaclat et al. v. The Argentine Republic', K&L Gates Legal Insight (17 October 2011, archived 26 June 2015), https://web.archive.org/web/20150626150515/http://www.klgates.com/arbitration-world-12-14-2011/#6

2 'Managing Eurozone risk through BIT planning', Clyde & Co (May 2012), https://www.clydeco.com/clyde/media/fileslibrary/Publications/2012/CC001232_Managing_Eurozone_risk_30.05.12.pdf, p.1

3 Piero Foresti, Laura de Carli & Others v. The Republic of South Africa, ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/07/01, Award (4 August 2010), http://icsidfiles.worldbank.org/icsid/ICSIDBLOBS/OnlineAwards/C90/DC1651_En.pdf

4 South Africa constitution, https://www.gov.za/sites/default/files/images/a108-96.pdf

5 'South Africa wants black ownership of mines maintained at 26%', Bloomberg (15 July 2014), https://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2014-07-15/south-africa-wants-black-ownership-of-mines-maintained-at-26-#xj4y7vzkg

6 'Foresti v. South Africa', Unctad Investment Dispute Settlement Navigator, https://investmentpolicy.unctad.org/investment-dispute-settlement/cases/262/foresti-v-south-africa

7 Piero Foresti, Laura de Carli & Others v. The Republic of South Africa, ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/07/01, Award (4 August 2010), http://icsidfiles.worldbank.org/icsid/ICSIDBLOBS/OnlineAwards/C90/DC1651_En.pdf

8 'Successful conclusion to SA – foresti arbitration proceedings', South Africa Department of Trade and Industry, Media Statement (2010), https://web.archive.org/web/20170207155601/https://www.thedti.gov.za/editmedia.jsp?id=1941

9 'South Africa terminates its bilateral investment treaty with Spain: Second BIT terminated, as part of South Africa's planned review of its investment treaties', Herbert Smith Freehills, Arbitration Notes (21 August 2013), https://hsfnotes.com/arbitration/2013/08/21/south-africa-terminates-its-bilateral-investment-treaty-with-spain-second-bit-terminated-as-part-of-south-africas-planned-review-of-its-investment-treaties/

10 Peter Alexander and others, Marikana: Voices from South Africa's Mining Massacre, Ohio University Press (2012), https://www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctt46n3k0

11 Minaco Divisione Spessori, https://minaco.co.za/spessori#:~:text=Minaco%20Divisione%20Spessori%20has%20entrenched,than%20145%20000m%C2%B2%20per%20year.

12 Minaco Gallery: Commercial, https://minaco.co.za/commercial, and Minaco Finished Products https://minaco.co.za/finished-products

13 Terence Creamer, 'Arbitration battle ends as granite claimants withdraw', Mining Weekly (5 August 2010), https://www.miningweekly.com/article/arbitration-battle-ends-as-granite-claimants-withdraw-sa-awarded-costs-2010-08-05

14 Mandela's lawyer Bram Fischer: a man who paid the ultimate price, The Conversation (7 May 2019), https://theconversation.com/mandelas-lawyer-bram-fischer-a-man-who-paid-the-ultimate-price-116436

15 Kyla Tienhaara, 'Regulatory chill and the threat of arbitration: A view from political science', Evolution in Investment Treaty Law and Arbitration, Cambridge University Press (2011), https://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2065706

16 'South Africa and bilateral investment treaties', Presentation by Xavier Carim, Deputy Director General, Department of Trade and Industry South Africa (6 September 2013), https://saiia.org.za/wp-content/uploads/2015/05/2013-09-06-Pres-Xavier-Carim-SA-BITs-DTI.pdf

17 Jean Kalicki, 'Investment arbitration in Brazil: Revisiting Brazil's traditional reluctance towards ICSID, BITs and investor-state arbitration', Arbitration International (September 2008), 10.1093/arbitration/24.3.423

18 Lucille Davie, 'Wits turns 85 today', Website of the City of Johannesburg (4 October 2007, archived 24 April 2015), https://web.archive.org/web/20150424054443/http://www.joburg.org.za/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=1719&Itemid=203

Chapter 4

1 'The capitalist challenge', TIME Magazine, 28 October 1957 | Vol. LXX No. 18, p.59, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/61/

2 Ibid.

3 'The capitalist challenge: The valiant venture', TIME Magazine, 28 October 1957 | Vol. LXX No. 18, p.60, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/62

4 Ibid.

5 'The capitalist challenge: The anti-capitalist attitude', TIME Magazine, 28 October 1957 | Vol. LXX No. 18, p.64, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/66

6 'The capitalist challenge', TIME Magazine, 28 October 1957 | Vol. LXX No. 18, p.63, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/61/

7 'The capitalist challenge', TIME Magazine, 28 October 1957 | Vol. LXX No. 18, p.59, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/61/

8 'Business abroad: A man of marks', TIME Magazine, 15 December 1961, https://content.time.com/time/subscriber/article/0,33009,827109-2,00.html

9 Robert S Wistrich, 'Who's who in Nazi Germany', Routledge (2013)

10 "Business Abroad: A Man of Marks," TIME, 15 December 1961, https://content.time.com/time/subscriber/article/0,33009,827109,00.html

11 Ibid.

12 Eric Roll, 'A Life in Focus: Hermann Abs, German banker and stalwart of German postwar reconstruction with Nazi ties', The Independent (14 July 2018), https://www.independent.co.uk/news/obituaries/hermann-abs-german-banker-died-economist-nazi-germany-a8442711.html

13 'The capitalist challenge', TIME Magazine, 28 October 1957 | Vol. LXX No. 18, p.60, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/62/

14 Chapter 11: Birth of a New Nation, The Autobiography of Martin Luther King, Jr. edited by Clayborne Carson, https://kinginstitute.stanford.edu/chapter-11-birth-new-nation

15 The Papers of Martin Luther King, Jr., Volume IV: Symbol of the Movement, January 1957–December 1958, University of California Press, 1992, p.146

16 'The capitalist challenge: The valient venture', TIME, 28 October 1957, p.60, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/62/

17 'The Capitalist Magna Carta: The Capitalist Magna Carta', TIME, 28 October 1957, p.65–6, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/67/

18 Ibid.

19 Saeed Kamali Dehghan and Richard Norton-Taylor, 'CIA admits role in 1953 Iranian coup', The Guardian (19 August 2013), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2013/aug/19/cia-admits-role-1953-iranian-coup

20 'CIA and assassinations: The Guatemala 1954 documents', edited by Kate Doyle and Peter Korbluh, National Security Archive Electronic Briefing Book No.4, https://nsarchive2.gwu.edu/NSAEBB/NSAEBB4/

21 Avi Shlaim, 'The protocol of sèvres,1956: Anatomy of a war plot', International Affairs, 73:3 (1997), p.509–30, https://users.ox.ac.uk/~ssfc0005/The%20Protocol%20of%20Sevres%201956%20Anatomy%20of%20a%20War%20Plot.html

22 'The Capitalist Magna Carta: The Capitalist Magna Carta', TIME, 28 October 1957, p.65–6, https://time.com/vault/issue/1957-10-28/page/67/

23 Jason Webb Yackee, 'The first investor-state arbitration: The Suez Canal Company v Egypt (1864)', The Journal of World Investment & Trade (2 June 2016)

24 Ibid.

25 Abs-Shawcross Draft Convention on Investments Abroad, reprinted in UNCTAD International Investment Instruments: A Compendium, UNCTAD/DITE/2 (Vol.V), 30 May 2000, p.301–3

26 Lord Shawcross of Friston, obituary. The Guardian (11 June 2003), https://www.theguardian.com/news/2003/jul/11/guardianobituaries.obituaries

27 "Descriptive summary," Eugene R. Black papers. MS 1108. Hargrett Rare Book and Manuscript Library, University of Georgia Libraries. https://sclfind.libs.uga.edu/sclfind/view?docId=ead/ms1108.xml

28 'History: Eugene Robert Black', World Bank website, https://www.worldbank.org/en/about/archives/history/past-presidents/eugene-robert-black

29 Eugene Robert Black, World Bank website, https://www.worldbank.org/en/archive/history/past-presidents/eugene-robert-black

30 'The capitalist challenge: The valiant venture', TIME, 28 October 1957, https://content.time.com/time/subscriber/article/0,33009,810061,00.html

31 Bankers with a Mission: The Presidents of the World Bank, 1946-91, edited by Jochen Kraske, p.94

32 Antonio R. Parra, The History of ICSID, OUP Oxford (2012), p.27

33 Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes Between States and Nationals of Other States: Analysis of Documents Concerning the Origin and the Formation of the Convention, Volume 2, Part 1, International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes: 1968, p.183

34 'Aron Broches, 83, Official at World Bank', The New York Times (16 September 1997), https://www.nytimes.com/1997/09/16/business/aron-broches-83-official-at-world-bank.html

35 Taylor St John, Chapter four: Supranational Agenda-Setting: The World Bank's 'Modest Proposal', The Rise of Investor-State Arbitration: Politics, Law, and Unintended Consequences, OUP Oxford (2018)

36 ICSID Convention, Regulations and Rules, https://icsid.worldbank.org/sites/default/files/documents/ICSID%20Convention%20English.pdf

37 Taylor St John, 'The power of modest multilateralism: The international centre for settlement of investment disputes (ICSID), 1964–1980', Doctor of Philosophy Thesis, University of Oxford, https://ora.ox.ac.uk/objects/uuid:aeca5b93-4493-4b75-9654-182a2c76e62a/download_file?file_format=pdf&safe_filename=THESIS02&type_of_work=Thesis

38 Ibid.

39 Taylor St John, The Rise of Investor-State Arbitration: Politics, Law, and Unintended Consequences, OUP Oxford (2018), p.123

40 Taylor St John, 'The power of modest multilateralism: The international centre for settlement of investment disputes (ICSID), 1964-1980,' Doctor of Philosophy Thesis, University of Oxford https://ora.ox.ac.uk/objects/uuid:aeca5b93-4493-4b75-9654-182a2c76e62a/download_file?file_format=pdf&safe_filename=THESIS02&type_of_work=Thesis

Chapter 5

1 'Germany moves forward on renewable energy plan', New York Times (8 April 2014), https://www.nytimes.com/2014/04/09/business/international/germany-moves-forward-on-renewable-energy-plan.html

2 Request for Arbitration, Vattenfall AV vs The Federal Republic of Germany, 30 March 2009, http://www.italaw.com/cases/1148

3 Ben Beach, 'Did the G20 shutdown point to a new type of protest?', Vice (19 July 2017), https://www.vice.com/en_uk/article/9kw833/did-the-hamburg-g20-shutdown-point-to-a-new-type-of-protest

4 'Request for arbitration', Vattenfall v The Federal Republic of Germany (30 March 2009), https://www.italaw.com/sites/default/files/case-documents/ita0889.pdf

5 'The energy charter treaty', adopted in Lisbon on 17 December 1994, International Energy Charter website, https://www.energycharter.org/fileadmin/DocumentsMedia/Legal/1994_ECT.pdf

6 Sebastian Knauer 'Power plant battle goes to international arbitration', Der Spiegel, 15 July 2009, http://www.spiegel.de/international/germany/vattenfall-vs-germany-power-plant-battle-goes-to-international-arbitration-a-636334.html

7 Roda Verheyen, 'Briefing note: The coal-fired power plant hamburg-moorburg, ICSID proceedings by Vattenfall under the Energy Charter Treaty and the result for environmental standards' (11 April 2012, archived 30 November 2019), https://web.archive.org/web/20191130100205/https://www.greenpeace.de/sites/www.greenpeace.de/files/publications/icsid_case_regarding_the_vattenfall_coal-fired_power_plant_hamburg-moorburg.pdf

8 'Guide to international arbitration', Latham & Watkins, May 2014, p.27, https://www.lw.com/admin/Upload/Documents/Guide-to-International-Arbitration-May-2014.pdf

9 Roda Verheyen, 'Briefing note: The coal-fired power plant hamburg-moorburg, ICSID proceedings by Vattenfall under the Energy Charter Treaty and the result for environmental standards' (11 April 2012, archived 30 November 2019), https://web.archive.org/web/20191130100205/https://www.greenpeace.de/sites/www.greenpeace.de/files/publications/icsid_case_regarding_the_vattenfall_coal-fired_power_plant_hamburg-moorburg.pdf

10 Cathrin Zengerling, Greening International Jurisprudence: Environmental NGOs before International Courts, Tribunals, and Compliance Committees, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers (2013), p.275

11 'Environment: Commission refers Germany to Court over coal power plant in Moorburg', European Commission press release (26 March 2015), https://ec.europa.eu/commission/presscorner/detail/GA/IP_15_4669

12 'Vattenfall wants 4.7 bln euros for German nuclear exit – govt source', Reuters (via Internet Archive) (15 October 2014), https://web.archive.org/web/20160311161556/http://af.reuters.com/article/commoditiesNews/idAFL6N0SA3AK20141015

13 Satoko Kishimoto, Olivier Petitjean and Lavinia Steinfort, Reclaiming Public Services: How Cities and Citizens are Turning Back Privatisation, Transnational Institute (2017), https://www.tni.org/en/file/10465/download?token=YB4jDkoh

14 'The re-municipalization of the Hamburg Grid', Energytransition.org (27 June 2014), https://energytransition.org/2014/06/remunicipalization-of-hamburg-grid/

15 Moorburgstrasse Stoppen campaign website http://moorburgtrasse-stoppen.blogspot.co.uk/

16 OVG Hamburg: Vorerst Bau-Stopp für Vattenfall's Moorburgtrasse, 24 February 2010, https://web.archive.org/web/20150409210519/http://www.altona.info/2010/02/24/ovg-hamburg-vorerst-bau-stopp-fur-vattenfalls-moorburgtrasse/

17 Kaid Benfield, 'How Hamburg became Europe's greenest city', Citylab (21 November 2011), https://web.archive.org/web/20161102093041/http://www.citylab.com/design/2011/11/how-hamburg-became-europes-greenest-city/538/

18 Hamburg citizens vote to buy back energy grid, Energytransition.de (October 2013, via Internet Archive), https://web.archive.org/web/20160605160800/http://energytransition.de/2013/10/hamburg-citizens-buy-back-energy-grid/

19 Satoko Kishimoto, Emanuele Lobina and Olivier Petitjean. Our Public Water Future, The Transnational Institute (2015), https://www.tni.org/en/publication/our-public-water-future

20 Unser Hamburg, Unser Netz (Our Hamburg, Our Networks) campaign website http://unser-netz-hamburg.de/

21 Unser Hamburg, Unser Netz (Our Hamburg, Our Networks), http://unser-netz-hamburg.de/pressematerial/

22 Priyanka Shrestha, 'Hamburg to buy district heating network from Vattenfall for €950m', Energy Live News (10 October 2018), https://www.energylivenews.com/2018/10/10/hamburg-to-buy-district-heating-network-from-vattenfall-for-e950m/

23 Bette Hilemann, 'Canada capitulates on MMT, settles with Ethyl' Chem. Eng. News (1998), 76, 30, 13a, https://pubs.acs.org/doi/10.1021/cen-v076n030.p013a

24 Mobil Investments Canada Inc & Murphy Oil Corporation and Canada, Award (20 February 2015), http://icsidfiles.worldbank.org/icsid/ICSIDBLOBS/OnlineAwards/C262/DC6732_En.pdf

25 Lone Pine Resources Inc. v. Canada (ICSID Case No. UNCT/15/2), https://icsid.worldbank.org/cases/case-database/case-detail?CaseNo=UNCT/15/2

26 Maude Barlow, 'Why Canada is One of the Most Sued Countries in the World', https://canadians.org/analysis/why-canada-one-most-sued-countries-world

27 Cases filed against the Government of Canada https://www.international.gc.ca/trade-agreements-accords-commerciaux/topics-domaines/disp-diff/gov.aspx?lang=eng

28 The Channel Tunnel Group Limited and France Manche SA vs. the UK and France; Partial award https://pca-cpa.org/en/cases/70/

29 'The eurotunnel arbitration', The Permanent Court of Arbitration, https://pca-cpa.org/en/cases/70/

30 Maude Barlow, 'Why Canada is one of the most sued countries in the world', https://canadians.org/analysis/why-canada-one-most-sued-countries-world

Chapter 6

1 'International Festival for Business 2014' UK Trade & Investment (25 March 2014), https://www.gov.uk/government/news/international-festival-for-business-2014-and-uk-trade-investment

2 Ibid.

3 'Ten facts about Liverpool', The Daily Telegraph (4 June 2003), https://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/1431943/Ten-facts-about-Liverpool.html

4 'Liverpool and the transatlantic slave trade' National Museums Liverpool Information Sheet https://www.liverpoolmuseums.org.uk/archivesheet3

5 Chris Long, 'The slavers and abolitionists on Liverpool's streets' (2020), https://www.bbc.com/news/uk-england-merseyside-51064508

6 'Aid Funded Business' Department for International Trade (11 April 2014), https://www.gov.uk/guidance/aid-funded-business

7 AidEx website, http://www.aid-expo.com/

8 AidEx website, http://www.aid-expo.com/aidex-brussels/exhibit

9 'Why should you exhibit at AidEx this year?' AidEx YouTube channel (29 July 2014), https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AMslrbsMeyQ

10 '230,000 join Mail call to use some of the UK's £11billion foreign aid budget to tackle floods crisis', The Daily Mail (14 February 2014), http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2559863/230-000-join-Mail-call-use-UKs-11billion-foreign-aid-budget-tackle-floods-crisis.html

11 Emma Maudsley, 'The Daily Mail petition gets international aid wrong', The Conversation (17 February 2014), https://theconversation.com/the-daily-mails-petition-gets-international-aid-wrong-23145

12 'Official development assistance – definition and coverage' OECD, http://www.oecd.org/dac/stats/officialdevelopmentassistancedefinitionandcoverage.htm

13 Claire Provost, 'Millions of pounds of overseas aid money spent in Britain', The Guardian (13 February 2014), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2014/feb/13/millions-of-pounds-overseas-aid-money-spent-britain

14 'Statistics on International Development 2013', UK Department for International Development (October 2013), https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/254277/Statistics_on_International_Development_2013a.pdf

15 According to the OECD DAC CRS database https://stats.oecd.org/Index.aspx?DataSetCode=crs1

16 '0.7 per cent aid target factsheet', Development Initiatives (28 August 2013), https://devinit.org/resources/0-7-aid-target-2/

17 'Managing the official development assistance target, a report on progress', UK National Audit Office (18 July 2017), https://www.nao.org.uk/press-release/managing-the-official-development-assistance-target-a-report-on-progress/

18 'The 0.7 per cent aid target', House of Commons research briefing (22 March 2022), https://commonslibrary.parliament.uk/research-briefings/sn03714/

19 Michael A. Clemens and Todd J. Moss, 'Ghost of 0.7 per cent: Origins and Relevance of the International Aid Target', Center for Global Development Working Paper no. 68 (September 2005), https://web.archive.org/web/20130720184240/http://www.cgdev.org/files/3822_file_WP68.pdf

20 Mark Tran, 'UK risks spending aid cash poorly, warn MPs', The Guardian (31 January 2013), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2013/jan/31/uk-risks-spending-aid-poorly

21 'UK aid: tackling global challenges in the national interest', Department for International Development (November 2015), https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/478834/ODA_strategy_final_web_0905.pdf

22 James Tapswell, 'Thatcher funeral cost "up to £3 million"', The Scotsman (29 July 2013), https://www.scotsman.com/news/uk-news/thatcher-funeral-cost-ps3-million-1566311

23 'Thatcher funeral invites', The Telegraph (11 April 2013), https://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/politics/margaret-thatcher/9987346/Thatcher-funeral-invites.html

24 The Politics and Economics of Britain's Foreign Aid: The Pergau Dam Affair. By Tim Lankester. Routledge; https://www.routledge.com/The-Politics-and-Economics-of-Britains-Foreign-Aid-The-Pergau-Dam-Affair/Lankester/p/book/9780415529525

25 MPs to investigate Malaysia dam aid: Minister faces questioning on Pergau river project arms links, The Independent (23 January 1994), https://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/mps-to-investigate-malaysia-dam-aid-minister-faces-questioning-on-pergau-river-project-arms-links-1408884.html

26 'The Pergau Dam "Arms for Aid" Scandal', The Compendium of Arms Trade Corruption project of the World Peace Foundation and The Fletcher School at Tufts University, https://sites.tufts.edu/corruptarmsdeals/the-pergau-dam-arms-for-aid-scandal/

27 Report by the Comptroller and Auditor General: Pergau Hydro-Electric Project, UK National Audit Office, printed 18 October 1993, https://www.nao.org.uk/pubsarchive/wp-content/uploads/sites/14/2018/11/Pergau-Hydro-Electric-Project.pdf

28 Margaret Thatcher speech in Malaysia 5 April 1985, on the Margaret Thatcher Foundation website, https://www.margaretthatcher.org/document/106009

29 Nikesh Mehta 'Lady Thatcher and Tun Mahathir: Era-defining Leaders' Foreign, Commonwealth and Development Office blog (11 April 2013), https://blogs.fcdo.gov.uk/nikeshmehta/2013/04/11/lady-thatcher-and-tun-mahathir-era-defining-leaders/

30 Margaret Thatcher speech to Citibank in Kuala Lumpur, 3 September 1993, on the Margaret Thatcher Foundation website, https://www.margaretthatcher.org/document/108320

31 Nikesh Mehta 'Lady Thatcher and Tun Mahathir: Era-defining Leaders' Foreign, Commonwealth and Development Office blog (11 April 2013), https://blogs.fcdo.gov.uk/nikeshmehta/2013/04/11/lady-thatcher-and-tun-mahathir-era-defining-leaders/

32 Margaret Thatcher speech in Malaysia, 5 April 1985, on the Margaret Thatcher Foundation website, https://www.margaretthatcher.org/document/106009

33 Margaret Thatcher speech at Malaysian-British Society Banquet 7 April 1985, on the Margaret Thatcher Foundation website, https://www.margaretthatcher.org/document/106014

34 John Harris, 'Into the void', The Guardian (3 February 2007), https://www.theguardian.com/politics/2007/feb/03/past.conservatives

35 'Thatcher refuses to attend Pergau inquiry', The Independent (19 May 1994), https://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/politics/thatcher-refuses-to-attend-pergau-inquiry-1437288.html

36 'Dam lies', The Economist (17 November 2012), https://www.economist.com/books-and-arts/2012/11/17/dam-lies

37 'The Pergau Dam "Arms for Aid" Scandal', The Compendium of Arms Trade Corruption project of the World Peace Foundation and The Fletcher School at Tufts University, https://sites.tufts.edu/corruptarmsdeals/the-pergau-dam-arms-for-aid-scandal/

38 'International development act 2002', UK government (archived 6 January 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20180106185338/https://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2002/1/data.pdf

39 Roya Wolverson, 'Beltway bandits', Newsweek (24 November 2007), https://www.newsweek.com/beltway-bandits-96591

40 Claire Provost, 'US food aid programme criticised as "corporate welfare" for grain giants', The Guardian (18 July 2012), http://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2012/jul/18/us-multinationals-control-food-aid

41 'Tied aid and development: Pergau dam', World Development Movement (archived 10 January 2014), https://web.archive.org/web/20140110034514/http://www.wdm.org.uk/past-campaign/tied-aid-and-development-pergau-dam

42 Deborah Doane, 'Aid for trade policy rears its ugly head', The Guardian (6 February 2012), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/poverty-matters/2012/feb/06/old-british-aid-policy-rears-head

43 'Why is so much UK aid money still going to companies based in Britain?' The Guardian (21 September 2012), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/datablog/2012/sep/21/why-is-uk-aid-going-to-uk-companies

44 Department for International Development Annual Report and Accounts 2014–15 https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/445698/Annual-Report-2014-2015.pdf

45 Claire Provost, 'The Privatisation of UK aid', Global Justice Now (April 2016), https://www.globaljustice.org.uk/sites/default/files/files/resources/the_privatisation_of_uk_aid.pdf

46 'Mayday: Crown Agents exposed', Indymedia UK (2 May 2003), https://www.indymedia.org.uk/en/2003/05/66130.html

47 James Arnold, 'The business of rebuilding war zones', BBC News (11 March 2003), http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/business/2840179.stm

48 Philip Thornton, 'British firm wins contract to help with post-war rebuilding of Iraq', The Independent (31 March 2003), https://www.independent.co.uk/news/business/news/british-firm-wins-contract-to-help-with-postwar-rebuilding-of-iraq-113097.html

49 'Our History', Crown Agents website, https://www.crownagents.com/who-we-are/our-history/

50 'Principals and agents: The activities of the crown agents for the colonies, 1880–1914', The Economic History Review, New Series, 52:2 (May 1999), p.284–306

51 David Sunderland, Managing the British Empire: The Crown Agents, 1833–1914, Boydell & Brewer Ltd (2004), p.6–7

52 David Sunderland, Managing the British Empire: The Crown Agents, 1833–1914, Boydell & Brewer Ltd (2004)

53 David Sunderland, 'Principals and agents: The activities of the crown agents for the colonies, 1880–1914', The Economic History Review, 52:2 (May 1999), https://www.jstor.org/stable/2599940?seq=1#page_scan_tab_contents

54 'Crown Agents collection, 1890–1983', British Empire & Commonwealth Collection, Bristol Archives (Reference 1999/221), https://becc.bristol.gov.uk/records/1999/221

55 William Dalrymple, 'The East India company: The original corporate raiders', The Guardian (4 March 2015), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2015/mar/04/east-india-company-original-corporate-raiders

56 Henry Srebrnik, 'Berlin conference 1884–1885', Routledge Encyclopedia of Modernism, https://www.rem.routledge.com/articles/berlin-conference-1884-1885

57 'The Swamps of Insurgency: Nigeria's Delta Unrest', International Crisis Group Africa Report N°115, 3 August 2006, p.3, https://www.bebor.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/09/ICG-Niger-Delta-Insurgency-Report.pdf

Chapter 7

1 'Harold Macmillan: The wind of change speech', Address to Members of both Houses of the Parliament of the Union of South Africa, Cape Town (3 February 1960), https://web-archives.univ-pau.fr/english/TD2doc1.pdf

2 W. David McIntyre, British Decolonization, 1946–1997: When, Why and How did the British Empire Fall? Palgrave History Collection (1998), https://link.springer.com/book/10.1007/978-1-349-26922-8

3 Mike Cowen, 'Early years of the colonial development corporation: British state enterprise overseas during late colonialism', African Affairs, 83:330 (January 1984), p.63–75, https://www.jstor.org/stable/721459?seq=1#page_scan_tab_contents

4 Geoff Tyler, 'All-Africa review of experiences with commercial agriculture the fall and rise of the colonial development corporation', Background paper for the Competitive Commercial Agriculture in Sub–Saharan Africa (CCAA) Study (undated, archived 15 February 2015), https://web.archive.org/web/20150215092047/http://siteresources.worldbank.org/INTAFRICA/Resources/257994-1215457178567/CCAA_Colonial.pdf

5 Finlo Roher, 'What's a little debt between friends?' BBC News Magazine (10 May 2006), http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/uk_news/magazine/4757181.stm

6 Nicola Swainson, The Development of Corporate Capitalism in Kenya, 1918–77, University of California Press (1 January 1980), p.137

7 Stephanie Decker, 'Corporate legitimacy and advertising: British companies and the rhetoric of development in West Africa, 1950–1970', The Business History Review, 81:1 (Spring 2007), p.59–86, https://www.jstor.org/stable/25097298

8 Michael McWilliam, The Development Business: A history of the Commonwealth Development Corporation, Basingstoke: Palgrave, (2001)

9 Geoff Tyler, 'All-Africa Review of Experiences with Commercial Agriculture The Fall and Rise of the Colonial Development Corporation', Background paper for the Competitive Commercial Agriculture in Sub–Saharan Africa (CCAA) Study

10 'Reform of CDC Group plc', Volume 516: debated on Tuesday 12 October 2010, https://hansard.parliament.uk/Commons/2010-10-12/debates/10101247000014/ReformOfCDCGroupPlc

11 Ivy Mungcal, 'Andrew Mitchell Explains New CDC Business Model', Devex (9 June 2011), https://www.devex.com/news/andrew-mitchell-explains-new-cdc-business-model-75009

12 Residencial Veranda website http://www.residencialveranda.com/

13 'Poverty headcount ratio at $5.50 a day (2011 PPP) (% of population)' UN Data, http://data.un.org/Data.aspx?d=WDI&f=Indicator_Code%3ASI.POV.UMIC

14 'Quienes Somos', Avance Ingenieros website http://www.avanceingenieros.com/avance-ingenieros-quienes-somos

15 'Villa Veranda Housing Project CAALA 10-001 El Salvador', (August 2012, archived 3 September 2014), https://web.archive.org/web/20140903084444/http://www.saa-sem.org/expedientes/factual_record_caala_10_001_english.pdf

16 Joseph Tanfani, Melanie Mason and Matea Gold, 'Bain capital started with help of offshore investors', The Los Angeles Times (19 July 2012, archived 25 March 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170325141030/http://articles.latimes.com/2012/jul/19/nation/la-na-bain-creation-20120719/2

17 Ryan Grim and Cole Stangler, 'Mitt Romney started bain capital with money from families tied to death squads', Huffington Post (8 August 2012), http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/08/08/mitt-romney-death-squads-bain_n_1710133.html

18 'Metrocentro, S.A de C.V', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/21505/metrocentro-s-a-de-c-v

19 According to the OECD DAC CRS database https://stats.oecd.org/Index.aspx?DataSetCode=crs1

20 'IFC Will Provide US$25 Million to Metrocentro S.A. De C.V., El Salvador's Largest Shopping Mall Operator' IFC press release (3 December 2003) https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=20178

21 'About IFC', IFC website https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/corp_ext_content/ifc_external_corporate_site/about+ifc_new

22 'IFC Will Provide US$25 Million to Metrocentro S.A. De C.V., El Salvador's Largest Shopping Mall Operator' IFC press release (3 December 2003), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=20178

23 'Grupo Poma 2009', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/28463/grupo-poma-2009

24 'ISCH', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/24375/isch

25 'ISCH III', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SII/38164/isch-iii

26 'Multiplaza', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/8620/multiplaza

27 'About Us', Hillwood, a Perot Company website https://www.hillwood.com/About/AboutUs.aspx

28 Bill Trott, 'US billionaire Ross Perot, who shook presidential politics, dead at 89', Reuters (9 July 2019), https://www.reuters.com/article/us-people-ross-perot-idUSKCN1U41PL

29 'GM, Perot Computer Firm Agree on $2.5 Billion Merger', The Washington Post (29 June 1984), https://www.washingtonpost.com/archive/politics/1984/06/29/gm-perot-computer-firm-agree-on-25-billion-merger/88790acf-6b14-4504-af8f-6c874ed27e97/

30 'Ross Perot, Texas billionaire who ran twice for president, has died', The Wall Street Journal (9 July 2019), https://www.wsj.com/articles/h-ross-perot-texas-billionaire-who-twice-ran-for-president-has-died-11562682596

31 'Perot purchases a copy of magna carta', The New York Times (27 September 1984), https://www.nytimes.com/1984/09/27/us/perot-purchases-a-copy-of-magna-carta.html

32 'Articles of Agreement', World Bank website, https://www.worldbank.org/en/about/articles-of-agreement#:~:text=The%20IFC%20Articles%20of%20Agreement,1993%20and%20June%2027%2C%202012

33 'Origins of IFC', IFC website, https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/corp_ext_content/ifc_external_corporate_site/about+ifc_new/ifc+history/origins-of-ifc

34 'IFC the first six decades: Leading the way in private sector development', IFC, second edition, https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/5e70149f-6cad-407a-944e-69d392079b47/IFC-History-Book-Second-Edition.pdf?MOD=AJPERES&CVID=llwwdJi

35 'International finance corporation', Encyclopedia Britannica, https://www.britannica.com/topic/International-Finance-Corporation

36 'June 20, 1957: IFC makes its first investment', World Bank Group Timeline, World Bank website, https://timeline.worldbank.org/event/1706

37 'Origins of IFC', IFC website, https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/corp_ext_content/ifc_external_corporate_site/about+ifc_new/ifc+history/50s+and+60s

38 Devesh Kapur, John P. Lewis and Richard C. Webb, The World Bank: Its First Half Century, Vol. 1, Brookings Institution Press (1 August 2011), p.824

39 'Management's Discussion and Analysis and Consolidated Financial Statements', 30 June 2015, IFC (archived 29 March 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160329023245/http://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/6f469d8049648f838142f3cda2aea2d1/IFC+-+FY15+Q1-Q4+-+MDA+and+Financial+Statements+-+FINAL.pdf?MOD=AJPERES

40 'International finance corporation', Moody's Investors Service analysis, https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/424afccc-e954-44b3-bd6e-bc79141a1a1e/Moodys+Report+on+IFC+-+December+2014.pdf?MOD=AJPERES&CVID=kHAlusf

41 Jason Oringer and Carol Welch, 'Structural adjustment programs', Institute for Policy Studies (1 April 1998), https://ips-dc.org/structural_adjustment_programs/

42 Sophia Reuss, 'Understanding the Greek Debt Crisis: Lessons from structural adjustment', Alternatives international journal (3 August 2015), http://www.alterinter.org/spip.php?article4359

43 'Post photographer detained by police', The Washington Post (16 April 2000), https://www.washingtonpost.com/archive/politics/2000/04/16/post-photographer-detained-by-police/46d66752-c15c-43c3-8110-c2c2e2a5cf19/

44 'PRSPs: a continuation of structural adjustment', Bretton Woods Project (5 April 2004), https://www.brettonwoodsproject.org/2004/04/art-42231/

45 Kevin Currey, 'Some evolving trends at the world bank: Lending, funding, staffing' (briefing note, Ford Foundation, May 2014), p.2

46 'Bottom lines, better lives? Rethinking multilateral financing to the private sector in developing countries', report from ActionAid, Bretton Woods Project, ChristianAid, Eurodad, Campagna per la riforma della banca mondiale, and Third World Network (March 2010), https://www.brettonwoodsproject.org/doc/private/privatesector.pdf

47 'IFC Supports Improved Services through Equity and Debt Financing to Manila Water Company', IFC press release (1 June 2004), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=20445

48 'Shutting the spigot on private water: The case for the World Bank to divest', Corporate Accountability report (April 2012), p.9, https://www.corporateaccountability.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/05/CAI_CasetoDivest_Final_web_rev_FINAL.pdf

49 Guillermo Perry, 'Growing business or development priority? multilateral development banks' direct support to private firms', Center for Global Development (April 2011), p.54–5, http:// www.cgdev.org/files/1424992_file_Perry_MDB_Direct_Support_FINAL.PDF

50 'Information statement', IFC (9 October 2014), p.29 https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/22171113-fe4f-49ae-a6cb-517bb4eedff2/FY14+Information+Statement+FINAL.PDF?MOD=AJPERES&CVID=nyOXRSB

51 Clarence Dias, 'Tanzanian nationalizations: 1967–1970', Cornell International Law Journal, 4:1 (Fall 1970) https://scholarship.law.cornell.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=1543&context=cilj

52 Chris Maina Peter, 'Promotion and protection of foreign investments in Tanzania: A new investment code', ICSID Review – Foreign Investment Law Journal, 6:1 (Spring 1991), p.42–64 https://academic.oup.com/icsidreview/article-abstract/6/1/42/741250?redirectedFrom=PDF

53 'Living up to diamonds', Report to Stakeholders 2005/6, p.21, https://www.debeersgroup.com/~/media/Files/D/De-Beers-Group-V2/documents/reports/publications/2006-report-to-society-.PDF

54 'Petra diamonds concludes Williamson acquisition', Mining Weekly (19 February 2009), https://www.miningweekly.com/article/petra-diamonds-concludes-williamson-acquisition-2009-02-19

55 'IFC Invests in Petra Diamonds to Reinvigorate and Expand Williamson Mine in Tanzania', IFC press release (28 September 2010), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=23151

56 'Williamson diamonds limited', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/28574/williamson-diamonds-limited

57 'IFC Invests in Petra Diamonds to Reinvigorate and Expand Williamson Mine in Tanzania', IFC press release (28 September 2010), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=23151

58 'Williamson Diamonds Limited', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/28574/williamson-diamonds-limited

59 Michael Fried, 'Pink Diamond Engagement Ring Buying Guide', The Diamond Pro (16 June 2022), https://www.diamonds.pro/education/pink/

Chapter 8

1 Natricia Duncan, '"Treat development like a business", says head of US aid agency, MCC', The Guardian Global Development Professionals' Network (28 March 2014), http://www.theguardian.com/global-development-professionals-network/2014/mar/28/millennium-challenge-corporation-economic-growth

2 Renewable Energy in Africa: Tanzania Country Profile, African Development Bank (2015), p.13 https://www.afdb.org/fileadmin/uploads/afdb/Documents/Generic-Documents/Renewable_Energy_in_Africa_-_Tanzania.pdf

3 Elissa Jobson, 'Has Africa's focus on farming borne fruit?' The Guardian (14 February 2014), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/poverty-matters/2014/feb/14/africa-farming-caadp-agriculture

4 Claire Provost, Liz Ford and Mark Tran, 'G8 New Alliance condemned as new wave of colonialism in Africa', The Guardian (18 February 2014), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2014/feb/18/g8-new-alliance-condemned-new-colonialism

5 'Business in Development', Independent Commission on Aid Impact, ICAI report 43 (May 2015), https://icai.independent.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/ICAI-Business-in-Development-FINAL.pdf

6 'Cooperation Framework to Support the New Alliance for Food Security & Nutrition in Burkina Faso' G8 New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa (2013), p.5, https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/208030/new-alliance-progress-report-coop-framework-burkina-faso.pdf

7 'Cooperation Framework to Support the New Alliance for Food Security & Nutrition in Ghana' G8 New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa (2013), p.6, https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/208055/new-alliance-progress-report-coop-framework-ghana.pdf

8 'Cooperation Framework to Support the New Alliance for Food Security & Nutrition in Senegal' G8 New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa (2013), p.12, https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/262518/Cooperation-Framework-NAFSN-Senegal.pdf

9 'Cooperation Framework to Support the New Alliance for Food Security & Nutrition in Mozambique', G8 New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa (2013), p.4, https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/208211/new-alliance-progress-report-coop-framework-mozambique.pdf

10 Claire Provost, Liz Ford and Mark Tran, 'G8 New Alliance condemned as new wave of colonialism in Africa', The Guardian (18 February 2014), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2014/feb/18/g8-new-alliance-condemned-new-colonialism

11 Ibid.

12 'Cooperation Framework to Support the New Alliance for Food Security & Nutrition in Tanzania', G8 New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa (2013), p.4, https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/208218/new-alliance-progress-report-coop-framework-tanzania.pdf

13 Claire Provost and Erick Kabendera, 'Tanzania: large-scale farming turns small farmers into mere labourers', The Guardian (18 February 2014), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2014/feb/18/tanzania-large-scale-farming-small-farmers-labourers

14 Lucinda Baring, 'Justin Forsyth's London', Financial Times, How to Spend it (10 November 2014, archived 22 June 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170622004318/https://howtospendit.ft.com/travel/68381-justin-forsyths-london

15 'Corporate Engagement', Oxfam website (archived 21 April 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160421231649/http://www.oxfam.org.uk/get-involved/how-your-company-can-partner-with-us/corporate-engagement

16 'Work with us', Save the Children website (archived 17 March 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170317042714/http://www.savethechildren.org.uk/about-us/who-we-work-with/corporate-partnerships/work-with-us

17 Nuria Molina-Gallart, 'Strange bedfellows? NGO-corporate relations in international development: an NGO perspective', Development Studies Research (20 June 2014), http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/pdf/10.1080/21665095.2014.915617

18 'GSK and Save the Children form unique partnership to save the lives of one million children', GSK press release (9 May 2013), https://www.gsk.com/en-gb/media/press-releases/gsk-and-save-the-children-form-unique-partnership-to-save-the-lives-of-one-million-children/

19 'GlaxoSmithKline to Plead Guilty and Pay $3 Billion to Resolve Fraud Allegations and Failure to Report Safety Date', The United States Department of Justice (2 July 2012), https://www.justice.gov/opa/pr/glaxosmithkline-plead-guilty-and-pay-3-billion-resolve-fraud-allegations-and-failure-report

20 'Changing world, changing aid: Where international development needs to go next', Speech by Justine Greening at the Overseas Development Institute (ODI) inn London (3 July 2015), https://www.gov.uk/government/speeches/changing-world-changing-aid-where-international-development-needs-to-go-next

21 Sam Jones and Carla Kweifio-Okai, 'World leaders agree sustainable development goals – as it happened', The Guardian (25 September 2015), https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/live/2015/sep/25/un-sustainable-development-summit-2015-goals-sdgs-united-nations-general-assembly-70th-session-new-york-live

22 Liz Ford, 'Global goals received with rapture in New York – now comes the hard part', The Guardian (25 September 2015), http://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2015/sep/25/global-goals-summit-2015-new-york-un-pope-shakira-malala-yousafzai

23 'Press Release: From Billions to Trillions – Transforming Development Finance Post-2015 Financing for Development: Multilateral Development Finance', International Monetary Fund (16 April 2015), https://www.imf.org/external/np/sec/pr/2015/pr15170.htm

24 'What do the Sustainable Development Goals mean for Global Health?' Kaiser Family Foundation, 9 September 2015 transcript of event (archived 23 June 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170623001207/https://kaiserfamilyfoundation.files.wordpress.com/2015/09/28795-what-do-the-sustainable-development-goals-mean-for-global-health-final.pdf

25 Shalailah Medhora, 'Richer nations reject call for tough tax provisions at foreign aid conference', The Guardian (16 July 2015), http://www.theguardian.com/world/2015/jul/16/richer-nations-reject-call-for-tough-tax-provisions-at-foreign-aid-conference

26 Jayati Ghosh, 'From "Development" to "Poverty Alleviation": What have we lost?' Frontline (4 September 2015), http://www.networkideas.org/news/aug2015/Development.pdf

27 'British government and Unilever join forces to help world's poor', Press release from Department for International Development and The Rt Hon Justine Greening (22 September 2014), https://www.gov.uk/government/news/british-government-and-unilever-join-forces-to-help-worlds-poor

28 Ibid.

29 'The Secretary-General's High-Level Panel of eminent persons on the Post-2015 Development Agenda', United Nations Secretary-General website, https://www.un.org/sg/en/management/hlppost2015.shtml

30 Paul Polman, 'Why Sustainability is No Longer a Choice (Op-Ed)', Live Science (1 March 2016), https://www.livescience.com/53897-exclusive-unilever-ceo-on-sustainability-as-team-effort.html

31 'The Surprising and Sensible Remarks of Unilever CEO Paul Polman', Center for Global Development (18 February 2014), https://www.cgdev.org/blog/surprising-and-sensible-remarks-unilever-ceo-paul-polman

32 '2017 Full Year Results', Unilever (1 February 2018), https://www.unilever.com/files/origin/9923ed5696818b1088e69b091896522a53212157.pdf/ir-q4-2017-full-announcement.pdf

33 'Unilever at a glance', Unilever website, https://www.unilever.com/our-company/at-a-glance/

34 'Brand and marketing investment of Unilever worldwide from 2014 to 2021', Statista Research Department (1 June 2022), https://www.statista.com/statistics/600133/univelever-marketing-spend/

Chapter 9

1 Friedrich Engels, The Condition of the Working Class in England, S. Sonnenschein & Company (1892), p.43

2 K. Dike Nworah, 'The politics of lever's west African concessions, 1907–1913', The International Journal of African Historical Studies, 5:2 (1972), p. 248–64, https://www.jstor.org/stable/217517

3 Alfred George Gardiner, Pillars of Society, J. Nisbet & Company (1913), p.199

4 Jules Marchal, E.D. Morel contre Léopold II. L'histoire du Congo (1900–1910), L'Harmattan (1996), p.449–50

5 Claire Phillips, 'Hubbris and colonial capitalism in a "model" company town. The case of Leverville, 1911–1940 – Benoit Henriet' (2 October 2017), http://copperbelt.

history.ox.ac.uk/2017/10/02/hubris-and-colonial-capitalism-in-a-model-company-town-the-case-of-leverville-1911-1940-benoit-henriet/

6 Brian Lewis, 'So Clean': Lord Leverhulme, Soap and Civilization, Manchester University Press (2008), p.175

7 Benoît Henriet, 'Hubris and colonial capitalism in a "model" company town. The case of Leverville, 1911–1940', Comparing the Copperbelt project funded by the European Research Council, https://copperbelt.history.ox.ac.uk/2017/10/02/hubris-and-colonial-capitalism-in-a-model-company-town-the-case-of-leverville-1911-1940-benoit-henriet/

8 Jules Marchal, Lord Leverhulme's Ghosts: Colonial Exploitation in the Congo, Verso Books (2008)

9 'The United Africa Company Ltd', Unilever Archives, http://unilever-archives.com/Record.aspx?src=Catalog&id=GB1752.UAC

10 'The Formation of Unilever', Unilever Archives & Records Management, Information Guide No.4, https://www.unilever.com/files/origin/3d0982a9cc0a89b9b4834edc8023cb1e54477f4e.pdf/formation-of-unilever-brochure.pdf

11 Patrick Smith, 'Corporate Profile: (UAC) United Africa Company 'The Alternative Government', Multinational Monitor (1989)

12 Walter Rodney, How Europe Underdeveloped Africa, originally published 1972, Pambazuka Press (2012), p.190

13 Walter Rodney, How Europe Underdeveloped Africa, originally published 1972, Pambazuka Press (2012), p.193

14 'Agro-colonialism in the Congo: European and US development finance bankrolls a new round of agro-colonialism in the DRC', RIAO-RDC & GRAIN (2 June 2015), https://grain.org/article/entries/5220-agro-colonialism-in-the-congo-european-and-us-development-finance-bankrolls-a-new-round-of-agro-colonialism-in-the-drc

15 Ibid.

16 'Kodaikanal Won't', Jhatkaa Org YouTube channel, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nSal-ms0vcI

17 Aaron Pereira, 'Kodaikanal mercury poisoning: HUL settles with former workers, but there's much left to do', The Indian Express (9 March 2016), http://indianexpress.com/article/india/india-news-india/kodaikanal-mercury-poisoning-hul-settles-with-former-workers-but-theres-much-left-to-do/

18 'Palm Oil: Global brands profiting from child and forced labour', Amnesty International (30 November 2016), https://www.amnesty.org/en/latest/news/2016/11/palm-oil-global-brands-profiting-from-child-and-forced-labour/

19 Graham Ruddik, 'Unilever boss warns UK against sugar tax', The Guardian (25 January 2016), http://www.theguardian.com/business/2016/jan/25/unilever-boss-warns-uk-against-sugar-tax

20 'Malvinder & Shivinder Singh', Forbes profile, http://www.forbes.com/profile/malvinder-shivinder-singh/

21 IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SII/33057/fortis-healthcare-ltd

22 'Miguel Facusse dies at 90; colorful, ruthless Honduran tycoon', The Los Angeles Times (23 June 2015), http://www.latimes.com/local/obituaries/la-me-miguel-facusse-20150624-story.html

23 'Ray Lee Hunt', Forbes profile, http://www.forbes.com/profile/ray-lee-hunt/

24 'Peru LNG', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/25390/peru-lng

25 'About Us', Compliance Advisor Ombudsman, https://www.cao-ombudsman.org/about-us

26 'Assessing International Finance Corporation's (IFC) Poverty Focus and Results', World Bank Independent Evaluation Group, IEG (20 March 2013), https://ieg.worldbankgroup.org/evaluations/assessing-international-finance-corporations-ifc-poverty-focus-and-results

27 'IFC Helps Build Business-Enabling Infrastructure in Myanmar, Boosting Tourism', IFC press release (26 March 2014), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=17069

28 Aye Aye Win, "Lo Hsing Han, 'Godfather of Heroin,' dies at 80" The Washington Post (9 July 2013), https://www.washingtonpost.com/world/lo-hsing-han-godfather-of-heroin-dies-at-80/2013/07/08/3059085e-e816-11e2-a301-ea5a8116d211_story.html

29 'Dropping the hammer on crony Stephen Law', US cable from Burma to CIA and other recipients (28 December 2007), published on Wikileaks, https://wikileaks.org/plusd/cables/07RANGOON1211_a.html

30 'Maldives SL', IFC Project Information and Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/25498/maldives-sl

31 'Shangri-La Ulaanbaatar Hotel LLC', IFC Project Information and Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/28546/shangrila-ulaanbaatar-hotel-llc

32 'SL Myanmar', IFC Project Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SII/33127/sl-myanmar

33 'IFC Helps Build Business-Enabling Infrastructure in Myanmar, Boosting Tourism', IFC press release (26 March 2014), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=17069

34 Physicians (per 1,000 people), World Bank data, http://data.worldbank.org/indicator/SH.MED.PHYS.ZS

35 'IFC Helps Build Business-Enabling Infrastructure in Myanmar', Boosting Tourism, IFC press release (26 March 2014, archived 25 September 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170925220020/http://ifcext.ifc.org/IFCExt/pressroom/IFCPressRoom.nsf/0/848EE8FFEDE6927985257CA7002946B9

36 Discount Chain Accused of Spying on Workers, Spiegel International (26 March 2008), https://www.spiegel.de/international/business/big-brother-allegations-discount-chain-accused-of-spying-on-workers-a-543485.html

37 '"We made big mistakes": Grocery Discounter Lidl Seeks to Repair Image', Spiegel International (25 February 2009), http://www.spiegel.de/international/business/we-made-big-mistakes-grocery-discounter-lidl-seeks-to-repair-image-a-609824.html

38 'Lidl Polish workers banned from speaking own language', The Scotsman, http://www.scotsman.com/news/odd/lidl-polish-workers-banned-from-speaking-own-language-1-3596137

39 Stephen Evans, 'Germany's super-shy super-rich', BBC News (28 July 2014), http://www.bbc.com/news/magazine-28472884

40 'Dieter Schwarz', Forbes profile, http://www.forbes.com/profile/dieter-schwarz/

41 'Labor group accuses German supermarket chain of mistreating staff', Progressive Grocer (14 December 2004), https://www.progressivegrocer.com/labor-group-accuses-german-supermarket-chain-mistreating-staff

42 Summary of Project Information: Schwarz Group (2004), IFC Projects Database (archived 2 July 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160702074937/http://ifcext.ifc.org/ifcext/spiwebsite1.nsf/1ca07340e47a35cd85256efb00700cee/E77B87793A34D6F8852576BA000E25D2

43 Summary of Proposed Investment: Lidl Romania (2011), IFC Projects Database (archived 7 January 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160107073030/http://ifcext.ifc.org/ifcext/spiwebsite1.nsf/78e3b305216fcdba85257a8b0075079d/b337d1f32571c021852579420076e7fb?opendocument

44 Summary of Investment Information: Schwarz III (2013), IFC Projects Database (archived 7 January 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160107074633/http://ifcext.ifc.org/ifcext/spiwebsite1.nsf/651aeb16abd09c1f8525797d006976ba/e5c259c51aaa7ece85257af600657b21?opendocument

Chapter 10

1 'Poland – Structural Adjustment Loan Project (English)', The World Bank (1990), https://documents.worldbank.org/en/publication/documents-reports/documentdetail/405551468332362049/poland-structural-adjustment-loan-project

2 'International investment agreements navigator: Poland', UNCTAD Investment Policy Hub website, https://investmentpolicy.unctad.org/international-investment-agreements/countries/168/poland

3 In Polish: 'Który supermarket w Polsce jest najtańszy? [ranking]' (2014), http://www.mmkrakow.pl/artykul/ktory-supermarket-w-polsce-jest-najtanszy-ranking,2701980,art,t,id,tm.html

4 'Supporting privatisation and restructuring', in After the Berlin Wall: A History of the EBRD, Volume 1, edited by Andrew Kilpatrick, Central European University Press (2020), p.151–84

5 'Guide to EBRD financing', EBRD (September 2013), https://www.ebrd.com/downloads/research/factsheets/guidetofinancing.pdf

6 'Environmental and Social policy', EBRD website, https://www.ebrd.com/environmental-and-social-policy.html

7 'Bankwatch analysis of EBRD operations in CEE at 25 years since the fall of the Berlin Wall', Counter Balance (14 May 2014), https://counter-balance.org/news/bankwatch-analysis-of-ebrd-operations-in-cee-at-25-years-since-the-fall-of-the-berlin-wall

8 'Where we are', EBRD website, https://www.ebrd.com/where-we-are.html

9 'EBRD headquarters', EBRD website, https://www.ebrd.com/corporate-information/london-headquarters.html

10 Ibid.

11 ‘A Dangerous Diversion: Will the IFC’s flagship health PPP bankrupt Lesotho’s Ministry of Health?’ Oxfam briefing note (7 April 2014), http://policy-practice.oxfam.org.uk/publications/a-dangerous-diversion-will-the-ifcs-flagship-health-ppp-bankrupt-lesothos-minis-315183

12 ‘Investing for the Few: The IFC’s Health in Africa initiative’, Oxfam briefing note (September 2014), https://policy-practice.oxfam.org/resources/investing-for-the-few-the-ifcs-health-in-africa-initiative-325654/

13 ‘IFC support to health public-private partnerships’, IFC report (2010), https://documents1.worldbank.org/curated/en/114801468182945951/text/667640WP00PUBL0C0Support2Health0WEB.txt

14 ‘IFC Finances Romania’s first private hospital chain to increase delivery of health services to country’s interior’, IFC press release (16 October 2006), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=21056

15 ‘Plastic and reconstructive surgery’, MedLife International website https://www.medlifeinternational.com/treatment/plastic-and-reconstructive-surgery.html

16 ‘Grain and Flour Market in Ukraine’, Miller magazine (8 April 2014), https://millermagazine.com/blog/grain-and-flour-market-in-ukraine-1919

17 ‘MHP WCF’, In Ukrainian: Будівництво та експлуатація комплексу «Вінницький бройлер»: екологічні та соціальні аспекти, NECU http://necu.org.ua/wp-content/uploads/Ladyzyn_Report_URK.pdf

18 Christina Plank, ‘Land grabs in the black Earth: Ukrainian oligarchs and international investors’, Heinrich Boell Stiftung (30 October 2013), https://www.boell.de/de/node/280169

19 Elizabeth Fraser, ‘Who Owns Agricultural Land in Ukraine?’ Oakland Institute (8 May 2015), http://www.oaklandinstitute.org/who-owns-agricultural-land-ukraine

20 ‘Historical Lookup’, MHP website (archived 22 February 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160222094845/http://www.mhp.com.ua/en/investor-relations/share-information/historical-lookup

21 Tatiana Serafin, ‘Can Ukraine’s billionaires save the country?’ Forbes (16 July 2014), http://www.forbes.com/sites/tatianaserafin/2014/07/16/can-ukraines-billionaires-save-the-country/

22 ‘MHP Ukraine’, and ‘MHP WCF’ IFC Project Information Portal, https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/ESRS/29204/mhp-ukraine; https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SII/32632/mhp-wcf

23 ‘IFC Invests Up to $250 Million in Poultry Producer MHP to Fuel Ukraine Agribusiness’, IFC press release (24 June 2014, archived 8 March 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160308134108/http://ifcext.ifc.org/ifcext/pressroom/IFCPressRoom.nsf/0/CA1B4445BB36F87085257D0100468E23/

24 ‘Vertical Integration’, MHP website (archived 12 December 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20161212111419/http://www.mhp.com.ua/en/operations/integration

25 ‘Ukraine sends first foie gras shipment to EU’, Poultry World (30 December 2013), https://www.poultryworld.net/poultry/ukraine-sends-first-foie-gras-shipment-to-eu/

Chapter 11

1 Herbert Thirkell White, 'Burma' Southeast Asia Visions collection, Cambridge University Press (1923), p.108, http://seasiavisions.library.cornell.edu/catalog/seapage:293_122

2 Dulyapak Preecharushh, 'Myanmar's new capital city of Naypyidaw', Engineering Earth (2010), https://www.academia.edu/10968648/Myanmar_s_New_Capital_City_of_Naypyidaw

3 'Myanmar's saffron revolution: 10 years later', Radio Free Asia (2017), https://www.rfa.org/english/news/special/saffron/

4 'Aung San Suu Kyi: Myanmar democracy icon who fell from grace', BBC News (6 December 2021), https://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-asia-pacific-11685977

5 'Myanmar's new capital: Remote, lavish and off limits', The New York Times (23 June 2008), https://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/23/world/asia/23iht-myanmar.4.13919850.html

6 Siddharth Varadarajan, 'Dictatorship by cartography', Himal South Asian (February 2007), http://svaradarajan.blogspot.co.uk/2007/02/dictatorship-by-cartography-geometry.html

7 'Capital move update: On a road to nowhere' US government cable released by WikiLeaks (dated 23 November 2005), https://wikileaks.org/plusd/cables/05RANGOON1325_a.html

8 'The seat of kings', in Benedict Rogers, Than Shwe: Unmasking Burma's Tyrant, Silkworm Books (2010)

9 Trade Union Manual on Export Processing Zones, International Labour Organization (2014), https://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/@ed_dialogue/@actrav/documents/publication/wcms_324632.pdf, p. 3

10 Ibid.

11 Malcolm Hanney, 'Myanmar needs to press ahead with its "Big Bang"', NikkeiAsia (28 July 2014), https://asia.nikkei.com/Economy/Malcolm-Hanney-Myanmar-needs-to-press-ahead-with-its-Big-Bang

12 'New investment law helps Myanmar rebuild its economy and create jobs', World Bank (25 Jan 2017), https://www.worldbank.org/en/news/feature/2017/01/25/new-investment-law-helps-myanmar-rebuild-its-economy-and-create-jobs

13 'About the Myanmar Britain business association', MBBA website (archived 6 March 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160306163643/http://mbba.co.uk/about-myanmar-britain-business-association/

14 'Myanmar 2014/15 FDI swells to $8.1 bln – govt agency', Reuters (25 March 2015), https://www.reuters.com/article/myanmar-investment-idUSL3N0WR25Q20150325

15 'Statement by President Barroso following his meeting with Mr U Thein Sein, President of Myanmar', European Commission (5 March 2013), https://ec.europa.eu/commission/presscorner/detail/en/SPEECH_13_184

16 'EU trade relations with Myanmar', European Commission website, https://policy.trade.ec.europa.eu/eu-trade-relationships-country-and-region/countries-and-regions/myanmar_en

17 'Myanmar accedes to the New York convention', DDFL (19 August 2013), https://www.dfdl.com/resources/legal-and-tax-updates/myanmar-accedes-to-the-new-york-convention-34/

18 Justin Heifetz, 'New hope for foreign investment as Myanmar signs convention', Myanmar Times (7 March 2013), https://www.mmtimes.com/business/4462-new-hope-for-foreign-investment-as-myanmar-signs-convention.html

19 'Myanmar to sign New York convention', New York Arbitration Convention website (2013, archived 13 October 2014), https://web.archive.org/web/20141013173452/www.newyorkconvention.org/news/myanmar-to-sign-new-york-convention

20 'EU-Myanmar Bilateral investment treaty', Transnational Institute briefing March 2014, https://www.tni.org/files/download/eu-myanmar_bit.pdf

21 Ibid.

22 'Investment policy', in OECD Investment Policy Reviews: Myanmar 2020, OECD iLibrary, https://www.oecd-ilibrary.org/sites/0d414646-en/index.html?itemId=/content/component/0d414646-en

23 Lorenzo Cotula, 'The state of exception and the law of the global economy: A conceptual and empirico-legal inquiry', Transnational Legal Theory, 8:4 (2017), p.424–54, https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/pdf/10.1080/20414005.2017.1425811

24 Trade Union Manual on Export Processing Zones, International Labour Organization (2014), https://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/@ed_dialogue/@actrav/documents/publication/wcms_324632.pdf, p.iv

25 Thomas Farole, S*pecial Economic Zones in Africa: Comparing Performance and Learning from Global Experiences,* World Bank (2011), https://openknowledge.worldbank.org/handle/10986/2268, p.23

26 'Facility for Investment Climate Advisory Services (FIAS)', World Bank (19 October 2016, archived 15 January 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170115202905/http://www.worldbank.org/en/topic/competitiveness/brief/facility-for-investment-climate-advisory-services-fias

27 Special Economic Zones: Performance, Lessons Learned, and Implications for Zone Development, World Bank FIAS (2008), https://documents1.worldbank.org/curated/en/343901468330977533/pdf/458690WP0Box331s0April200801PUBLIC1.pdf, p.2

28 Reid Wilson, 'Washington just awarded the largest state tax subsidy in U.S. history', The Washington Post (12 November 2013), https://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/govbeat/wp/2013/11/12/washington-just-awarded-the-largest-state-tax-subsidy-in-u-s-history/

29 Ana Teresa Tavares-Lehmann and Rodrigo Tavares "Economic nationalism is on the rise, but the future of trade lies with cities," World Economic Forum website (3 February 2017), https://www.weforum.org/agenda/2017/02/economic-nationalism-is-on-the-rise-but-the-future-of-trade-lies-with-cities/

30 Handbook for Promoting Foreign Direct Investment in Medium-Size, Low-Budget Cities in Emerging Markets, Millennium Cities Initiative (MCI), November 2009, http://mci.ei.columbia.edu/files/2012/12/MCI-City-Investment-Promotion-Handbook2.pdf

31 Global Investment Promotion Benchmarking 2009: Summary Report, World Bank Group Advisory Services: Investment Climate (May 2009), http://documents.worldbank.org/curated/en/292031468331270598/pdf/491180WP0v20In10Box338941B01PUBLIC1.pdf

32 ‘Honduran judges rule against privately run “model cities” project’, The Guardian (4 October 2012), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2012/oct/04/honduran-judges-reject-model-cities

33 Experience Gained in the Development of China’s Special Economic Zones, China Development Bank, https://www.worldbank.org/content/dam/Worldbank/Event/Africa/Investing%20in%20Africa%20Forum/2015/investing-in-africa-forum-chinas-special-economic-zone.pdf

34 Douglas Zhihua Zeng, ‘China’s special economic zones and industrial clusters: Success and challenges’, Lincoln Institute of Land Policy (2012), https://www.lincolninst.edu/sites/default/files/pubfiles/2261_1600_Zeng_WP13DZ1.pdf

Chapter 12

1 John Gibney, A Short History of Ireland, 1500–2000, Yale University Press (2018) p.68

2 ‘Air transport services: Agreement between the United States of America and Ireland’ (1945)

3 ‘A History of Innovation’, Shannon Group website, https://www.shannongroup.ie/who-we-are/shannon-group-history

4 ‘From small beginnings … the Shannon story’, The World Rovers The Moodie Davitt Report, 2007 (archived 1 February 2016), http://www.moodiereport.com/pdf/twr_3.pdf

5 ‘Brendan O’Regan’, The Independent Ireland (10 February 2008), https://www.independent.ie/world-news/brendan-oregan-26422357.html

6 ‘1st Free Zone’, Shannon Group website, https://www.shannongroup.ie/innovation/1st-free-zone

7 Shannon International Development Consultants (SIDC) website, http://www.sidc.ie/

8 Rosita Boland, ‘Shannon Town: the “planned” town that got left behind’, Irish Times (3 October 2021), https://www.irishtimes.com/life-and-style/shannon-town-the-planned-town-that-got-left-behind-1.4686534

9 ‘“Extraordinary rendition”: A review of Ireland’s human rights obligations’, Irish Human Rights Commission (2007), https://www.ihrec.ie/download/pdf/ihrc_rendition_report_final.pdf

10 Danielle Ryan, ‘These Irish antiwar protesters are sick of having the US military in their country’, The Nation (20 October 2015), https://www.thenation.com/article/archive/these-irish-anti-war-protesters-are-fed-up-with-having-the-us-military-in-their-country/

11 Trade Union Manual on Export Processing Zones, International Labour Organization (2014), https://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/@ed_dialogue/@actrav/documents/publication/wcms_324632.pdf, p.4–45

12 ‘Political priority, economic gamble’, The Economist (4 April 2015), https://www.economist.com/finance-and-economics/2015/04/04/political-priority-economic-gamble

13 'Address at the 17th General Conference of UNIDO by Vice Minister WANG Shouwen', Permanent Mission of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations and Other International Organizations in Vienna (28 November 2017), http://vienna.china-mission.gov.cn/eng/hyyfy/201711/t20171128_8848281.htm

14 John McDermott, 'The rule of law in Hong Kong after 1997', Loyola of Los Angeles International and Comparative Law Review, 19:2 (1997), https://digitalcommons.lmu.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=1411&context=ilr

15 'Death of 6 at ICC an accident, coroner rules', South China Morning Post (11 December 2010), https://www.scmp.com/article/733022/death-6-icc-accident-coroner-rules

16 'Our heritage', East India Company website, https://www.theeastindiacompany.com/finefood/fine-foods/the-company/our-heritage/

17 'Hong Kong ceded to the British', History.com, https://www.history.com/this-day-in-history/hong-kong-ceded-to-the-british

18 Zheping Huang, 'Edward Snowden got out of Hong Kong by hiding in the one place the government would never think to look', Quartz (7 September 2016), https://qz.com/775250/nsa-whistleblower-edward-snowden-escaped-from-hong-kong-thanks-to-the-wretched-lives-of-some-of-the-citys-11000-refugees/

Chapter 13

1 'Fifth man working for publishers critical of Chinese government goes missing,' The Guardian (2 January 2016), https://www.theguardian.com/global/2016/jan/02/fifth-man-working-for-publishers-critical-of-chinese-government-goes-missing

2 Nash Jenkins and Rishi Iyengar, 'Returned Hong Kong bookseller recounts eight-month detention in China,' Time (16 June 2016), https://time.com/4371283/hong-kong-bookseller-china-detention-lam-wing-kee/

3 'President hails Shenzhen SEZ a world "miracle"', China Daily (2010), http://www.chinadaily.com.cn/china/2010-09/07/content_11264644.htm

4 Naomi Klein, 'China's all-seeing eye,' Rolling Stone (14 May 2008), https://naomiklein.org/chinas-all-seeing-eye/

5 Claire Provost and Matt Kennard, 'Inside the corporate Utopias where capitalism rules and labor laws don't apply,' In These Times (25 July 2016), https://inthesetimes.com/features/special-economic-zones-corporate-utopia-capitalism.html

6 Jonathan Steele, 'America puts the flag out for Deng,' The Guardian (30 January 1979), https://www.theguardian.com/world/1979/jan/30/china.usa

7 Gethin Chamberlain, 'Disney factory faces probe into sweatshop suicide claims,' The Observer (27 August 2011), https://www.theguardian.com/law/2011/aug/27/disney-factory-sweatshop-suicide-claims

8 'China: Reforms of the household registration system (hukou) 1998-2004', Research Directorate of the Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada, https://www.refworld.org/pdfid/4305fbc04.pdf

9 'Poverty rate, 1990-2015,' UNICEF China https://www.unicef.cn/en/figure-29-poverty-rate-19902015

10 Elizabeth Stuart, 'China has almost wiped out urban poverty. Now it must tackle inequality,' The Guardian (19 August 2015), https://www.theguardian.com/business/economics-blog/2015/aug/19/china-poverty-inequality-development-goals

11 'Cambodian garment workers demand higher wages,' Deutsche Welle (30 December 2013), https://www.dw.com/en/cambodian-garment-workers-demand-higher-wages/a-17330628

12 Prak Chan Thul, 'Cambodia passes disputed trade union law as tension flares', Reuters (4 April 2016), https://www.reuters.com/article/us-cambodia-unions-idUSKCN0X11HX

13 Taylor Owen and Ben Kiernan 'Bombs over Cambodia', The Walrus (October 2006), https://gsp.yale.edu/sites/default/files/walrus_cambodiabombing_oct06.pdf

14 'Chea Vichea – the shooting and the aftermath', The Phnom Penh Post (30 January 2004), https://www.phnompenhpost.com/national/chea-vichea-shooting-and-its-aftermath

15 'Where have all the poor gone? Cambodia poverty assessment 2013', World Bank, April 2014, https://openknowledge.worldbank.org/bitstream/handle/10986/17546/ACS45450REVISE00English0260May02014.pdf?sequence=5&isAllowed=y

16 Ibid.

17 ITUC Global Rights Index 2015, https://www.ituc-csi.org/IMG/pdf/survey_global_rights_index_2015_en.pdf

18 GDP per capita (current US$), World Bank data https://data.worldbank.org/indicator/NY.GDP.PCAP.CD

19 'Cambodia gagged: democracy at risk? Report on Freedom of Expression', Article 19 and others (September 2010), https://www.article19.org/data/files/pdfs/publications/cambodia-gagged-democracy-at-risk-.pdf

20 'The dramatic deforestation of Cambodia as seen from space', Pacific Standard magazine (14 June 2017), https://psmag.com/news/the-dramatic-deforestation-of-cambodia-as-seen-from-space

21 Chris Arsenault, 'Cambodian land grabs are "crime against humanity", lawyers tell ICC' Thomson Reuters Foundation (7 October 2014), https://www.reuters.com/article/us-foundation-cambodia-landgrabs-idUSKCN0HW1R420141007

22 Peter Warr and Jayant Menon, 'Cambodia's Special Economic Zones', ADB Economics Working Paper Series (October 2015), https://www.adb.org/sites/default/files/publication/175236/ewp-459.pdf

23 Hélène Lavoix, 'Cambodia from 1945', SciencesPo (9 March 2008), https://www.sciencespo.fr/mass-violence-war-massacre-resistance/fr/document/cambodia-1945.html#:~:text=Between%2018%20March%201969%20and,Shawcross%2C%201979%2C%20297).

Chapter 14

1 Persis Taraporevala, 'Creating subjects in Lavasa: The private city', openDemocracy (16 April 2013), https://www.opendemocracy.net/en/opensecurity/creating-subjects-in-lavasa-private-city/

2 'India's First post-independence planned hill city', New Cities blog (2013), https://newcities.org/cityquest-lavasa-india-nations-first-post-independence-planned-hill-city/

3 'Government increases daily minimum wage to Rs 160 per day', The Economic Times (8 July 2015), https://economictimes.indiatimes.com/news/economy/policy/government-increases-daily-minimum-wage-to-rs-160-per-day/articleshow/47981456.cms

4 Joan Russel, 'The history of the American diner', Paste magazine (18 October 2016), https://www.pastemagazine.com/food/the-history-of-the-american-diner/

5 Dane Keith Kennedy, The Magic Mountains: Hill Stations and the British Raj, University of California Press (1996)

6 'Introduction', Ciptura Hanoi website (archived 20 January 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20180120041642/https://ciputrahanoi.com.vn/2/Introduction.htm

7 Ecopark website (archived 14 January 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20180114165033/https://ecopark.com.vn/en/

8 'British University Vietnam Ecopark Campus Groundbreaking Ceremony', Ecopark website (archived 15 February 2016), https://web.archive.org/web/20160215122054/https://ecopark.com.vn/en/what-s-happening/events/1169-british-university-vietnam-ecopark-campus-groundbreaking-ceremony

9 'Hundreds Protest Land Grabs in Capital' (21 February 2012), Radio Free Asia https://www.rfa.org/english/news/vietnam/protest-02212012162615.html

10 'Ecopark Satellite City Project, Hanoi, Vietnam', Environmental Justice Atlas, https://ejatlas.org/conflict/ecopark-satellite-city-project-hanoi-vietnam

11 'Poverty reduction in Vietnam: Remarkable progress, emerging challenges', World Bank (24 January 2013), http://www.worldbank.org/en/news/feature/2013/01/24/poverty-reduction-in-vietnam-remarkable-progress-emerging-challenges

12 'Super rich in Vietnam triple in past decade: WB report', VietNamNet (2014), https://vietnamnet.vn/en/super-rich-in-vietnam-triple-in-past-decade-wb-report-E107057.html

13 Abby Goodnough, 'Disney Is Selling a Town It Built to Reflect the Past', New York Times (16 January 2004), https://www.nytimes.com/2004/01/16/us/disney-is-selling-a-town-it-built-to-reflect-the-past.html

14 'North Ranch Sector Plan: Long-Term Master Plan', Osceola County Florida (18 May 2015), http://www.osceola.org/core/fileparse.php/5187/urlt/052815_NorthRanchMasterPlanDEOTransmittal.pdf

15 Peter Henderson 'Insight: Mormon church made wealthy by donations', Reuters (12 August 2012), http://www.reuters.com/article/us-usa-politics-mormons-idUSBRE87B05W20120812

16 NewVistas website, http://www.newvistasfoundation.org/

17 Carl J. Belliston, 'Non-Political Nature of NewVista', NewVistas Project Paper (15 March 2010), https://newvistasllc.sharepoint.com/NewVistas%20Foundation/_layouts/15/WopiFrame.aspx?guestaccesstoken=7%2bNsztlOVji5%2f5UPqiLCAa5zgRGP8eVyhWsLePo%2bjK8%3d&docid=0f19fcbfb6b4b4eac9f1bc0e33a92328d&action=view

18 Alliance for Vermont Communities website, https://www.alliancevermont.org/

19 John Hollenhorst, 'Utahn's "city of the future" vision stirs opposition in Vermont', Deseret News (17 August 2016), https://www.deseret.com/2016/8/17/20594280/utahn-s-city-of-the-future-vision-stirs-opposition-in-vermont

20 Steve Zind, Peter Hirschfeld and Angela Evancie, "'I'm Tired Of The Drama': Utah Man Abandons NewVistas Development," Vermont Public (27 June 2018) https://www.vermontpublic.org/vpr-news/2018-06-27/im-tired-of-the-drama-utah-man-abandons-newvistas-development-plan

21 Zoë Newmarco, "Hall Completes Sales Of NewVistas' Lands," The Herald (4 November 2021) https://www.ourherald.com/articles/hall-completes-sales-of-newvistas-lands/

22 Sue-lin Wong, 'China's Minsheng to invest 1 billion pounds in new London financial district project', Reuters (16 February 2015), https://www.reuters.com/article/uk-china-britain-property-idUKKBN0LK0OG20150216

23 Jon Ungoed-Thomas 'Boris Johnson's flagship London dock scheme on brink of collapse', The Observer (5 February 2022), https://www.theguardian.com/business/2022/feb/05/boris-johnsons-flagship-london-dock-scheme-on-brink-of-collapse

Chapter 15

1 James E. Meade, The Economic and Social Structure of Mauritius, Metheun (1961)

2 'Mauritius tourist arrivals jump 5 pct in 2017 – stats office', Reuters (9 January 2018), https://www.reuters.com/article/mauritius-tourism-idAFL8N1P43Q9

3 Greg Mills, 'South Africa and Mauritius, why do countries reform?' The Brenthurst Foundation (22 February 2018), http://www.thebrenthurstfoundation.org/article/south-africa-and-mauritius-why-do-countries-reform/

4 'GDP per capita – Mauritius', World Bank data https://data.worldbank.org/indicator/NY.GDP.PCAP.CD?locations=MU

5 'Real Estate: The Mauritian dream of home ownership', Defi Media (6 May 2017), https://defimedia.info/real-estate-mauritian-dream-home-ownership

6 Ndoli kalumiya and Luka Jovita Okumu, Mauritius: African Economic Outlook, OECD and others (2017), https://www.oecd-ilibrary.org/docserver/aeo-2017-45-en.pdf?expires=1657376860&id=id&accname=guest&checksum=A92A4BA7547C61764CF6579C22A4B36D, p.9

7 'Protocol signed with Mauritius', Deloitte tax@hand (13 May 2016), https://www.taxathand.com/article/1566/India/2016/Protocol-signed-with-Mauritius

8 'Thinking Africa? Think Mauritius', Business Chief (12 January 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20190504144031/https://africa.businesschief.com/finance/2684/Thinking-Africa-Think-Mauritius

9 'Mauritius strives to shake off "tax haven" tag', Financial Times (28 September 2016), https://www.ft.com/content/64b083bc-75b1-11e6-bf48-b372cdb1043a

10 'DTAA', IFS Mauritius (archived 19 April 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170419070029/http://www.ifsmauritius.com/dtaa

11 Naomi Fowler, 'India and the renegotiation of its double tax agreement with Mauritius: an update', Tax Justice Network (4 April 2019), https://taxjustice.net/2019/04/04/india-and-the-renegotiation-of-its-double-taxation-avoidance-agreement-with-mauritius-an-update/

12 'What is transfer pricing?' Tax Justice Network, https://taxjustice.net/faq/what-is-transfer-pricing/

13 'IFF Background', UNECA (archived 22 March 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170322033526/https://www.uneca.org/pages/iff-background

14 'IMF: Developing countries' BEPS revenue losses exceed $200 billion', Uncounted blog (1 June 2015), http://uncounted.org/2015/06/01/imf-developing-countries-beps-revenue-losses-exceed-200-billion/

15 Ibid.

16 'Africa Wealth Report 2017', AfrAsia Bank (April 2017), https://www.afrasiabank.com/media/2457/africa-wealth-report-2017.pdf, p.11

17 Pravind Jugnauth, 'A new era of development: Budget speech 2016/2017', https://mof.govmu.org/Documents/Documents/Budget%202016-2017/Budget2016-17/budgetspeech2016-17.pdf

18 Ramdass Gooriah, 'Mauritius: Encouraging investment', Mondaq (15 February 2017), https://www.mondaq.com/capital-gains-tax/566860/encouraging-investment

19 'Addressing inequality through more equitable labor markets in Mauritius', World Bank (26 March 2018), http://www.worldbank.org/en/news/press-release/2018/03/26/addressing-inequality-through-more-equitable-labor-markets-in-mauritius-world-bank-report

20 'More educated, less paid: what's behind the gender gap in Mauritius?' World Bank (4 April 2019), https://blogs.worldbank.org/africacan/more-educated-less-paid-whats-behind-the-gender-gap-in-mauritius

21 'Mauritius struggles with tax haven crackdown', Financial Times (4 October 2017), https://www.ft.com/content/e37d1df6-8436-11e7-94e2-c5b903247afd

22 'Malawi mangoes, environmental & social review', IFC Information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/ESRS/34816/malawi-mangoes

23 'Malawi: Promoting sustainable fruit industry', IFC and GASP, https://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/66b22183-b1bd-46a5-ac24-d22ad0aeab3b/MalawiMangoes.pdf?MOD=AJPERES&CVID=kxwTBwF

24 'Malawi mangoes, summary of investment information', IFC Project Information & Data Portal, https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SII/34816/malawi-mangoes

25 Ibid.

26 'Malawi mangoes', Environmental & Social Review Summary, IFC Project Information & Data Portal, https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/ESRS/34816/malawi-mangoes

27 ‘Malawi mangoes’, Summary of Investment Information, IFC Project Information & Data Portal, https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SII/34816/malawi-mangoes

28 ‘IFC, Google, Convergence Partners, Mitsui Invest in CSquared to Improve Broadband in Africa’, IFC Press Release (17 May 2017), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=25942

29 ‘Due Diligence’, IFC website, http://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/corp_ext_content/ifc_external_corporate_site/solutions/due+diligence

30 ‘Clampdown on tax havens: Where does the International Finance Corporation stand?’ Financial Transparency Coalition (21 October 2010), https://financialtransparency.org/clampdown-on-tax-havens-where-does-the-international-finance-corporation-stand/

31 ‘The IFC and Tax Havens’, Oxfam Briefing Note (11 April 2016), https://www.oxfam.org/sites/www.oxfam.org/files/file_attachments/ifcandtaxhavensen.pdf

32 Magdalena Mis, ‘World Bank invests in firms using tax havens says Oxfam’, Thomson Reuters Foundation (11 April 2016), https://www.reuters.com/article/us-world-bank-africa-investment/world-bank-invests-in-firms-using-tax-havens-says-oxfam-idUSKCN0X8242

33 Nicholas Ibekwe, ‘How Nigeria’s largest independent power plant is set up to funnel billions to tax haven’, Premium Times (9 November 2017), https://www.premiumtimesng.com/news/headlines/248809-nigerias-largest-independent-power-plant-set-funnel-billions-tax-haven.html

34 Jeff Mbanga, ‘Did Uganda miss $38 million in tax from Actis-Umeme deals?’ The Observer Uganda (18 October 2017), http://observer.ug/business/55476-did-uganda-miss-38-million-in-tax-from-actis-umeme-deals.html

35 ‘Ambitious Malawi fruit company gains US$15M support package’, Fresh Fruit Portal (18 July 2014) https://www.freshfruitportal.com/news/2014/07/18/ambitious-malawi-fruit-company-gains-us15m-support-package/

36 ‘Malawi Mangoes eyes new markets’, BusinessMalawi.com (17 January 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20191012080509/https://www.businessmalawi.com/malawi-mangoes-eyes-new-markets/

37 ‘Malawi mangoes limited’, UK Companies House registration https://beta.companieshouse.gov.uk/company/06971203/filing-history?page=1

38 ‘Malawi mangoes’, Environmental & Social Review Summary, IFC Project Information & Data Portal, https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/ESRS/34816/malawi-mangoes

39 Ibid.

40 ‘Land rights now! A loud calling from the homeless and destitute’, The Maravi Post (28 May 2017), http://www.maravipost.com/land-rights-now-loud-calling-homeless-destitute/

41 Ibid.

42 Max Weber, ‘Politics as a Vocation’, in From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology, translated and edited by H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills, New York: Oxford University Press (1946), p.77–128

Chapter 16

1 Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment, Doubleday, Doran & Company, Inc (1935)

2 'Chapter 14: Potential conflicts between capital-importing and capital-exporting countries', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

3 'Chapter 19: Specific suggestions', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

4 'Chapter 18: Alternative courses of action', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

5 'Chapter 19: Specific suggestions', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

6 Kelly Bauer, 'Amazing videos from 1933 world's fair shows what Chicago looked like more than 80 years ago', Block Club Chicago (13 May 2019), https://blockclubchicago.org/2019/05/13/amazing-videos-from-1933-worlds-fair-shows-what-chicago-looked-like-more-than-80-years-ago/

7 Chris LaMorte, 'Century of progress homes tour at Indiana Dunes takes visitors back to the future', Chicago Tribune (2 October 2017, archived 20 June 2018), https://www.chicagotribune.com/lifestyles/travel/fall-guide/2017/ct-fall-travel-century-of-progress-indiana-0806-20170804-story.html

8 Paul Kennedy, 'Pouring one out for coke', Antiques Trader (18 May 2021), https://www.antiquetrader.com/collectibles/coca-cola-historic-dispenser

9 William Elliott Hazelgrove, Al Capone and the 1933 World's Fair: The End of the Gangster Era in Chicago, Rowman & Littlefield Publishers (September 2017), p.219–33

10 Ibid., p.56

11 'Chapter 14: Potential conflicts between capital-importing and capital-exporting countries', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

12 'Chapter 18: Alternative courses of action', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

13 'Chapter 14: Potential conflicts between capital-importing and capital-exporting countries', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

14 'Chapter 18: Alternative courses of action', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

15 Ibid.

16 'Policy and business practices', International Chamber of Commerce (via Internet Archive), https://web.archive.org/web/20120706043653/https://iccwbo.org/about-icc/organisation/policy-and-business-practices/

17 'Global network', International Chamber of Commerce (via Internet Archive), https://web.archive.org/web/20141219080556/http://www.iccwbo.org/global-influence/icc-network/

18 Quinn Slobodian, Globalists: The End of Empire and the Birth of Neoliberalism, Harvard University Press (2018)

19 Ibid.

20 'Who pulls the strings? (Part 3)', The Guardian (10 March 2001), https://www.theguardian.com/books/2001/mar/10/extract1

21 'The Lewis Powell memo: A corporate blueprint to dominate democracy', Greenpeace website https://www.greenpeace.org/usa/democracy/the-lewis-powell-memo-a-corporate-blueprint-to-dominate-democracy/

22 Fred P. Graham, 'Powell proposed business defense', The New York Times (29 September 1972), https://www.nytimes.com/1972/09/29/archives/powell-proposed-business-defense-wrote-a-memo-for-chamber-before.html

23 'The Lewis Powell memo: A corporate blueprint to dominate democracy', Greenpeace website https://www.greenpeace.org/usa/democracy/the-lewis-powell-memo-a-corporate-blueprint-to-dominate-democracy/

24 Raymond Vernon, Sovereignty at Bay: The Multinational Spread of US Enterprises, Basic Books (1971)

25 Susan George, Shadow Sovereigns: How Global Corporations are Seizing Power, John Wiley & Sons (2015)

26 Hilary Wainwright, 'The spirit of 1968 is inextinguishable – even 50 years later', https://opendemocracy.net/5050/hilary-wainwright/spirit-of-1968-inextinguishable-50-years-later

27 David Vogel, Fluctuating Fortunes: The Political Power of Business in America, Basic Books, (1989), p.59

28 David W. P. Elliott, The Vietnamese War: Revolution and Social Change in the Mekong Delta, 1930–1975, Vol. 1, M.E. Sharpe (2003), p.353

29 Ann C. Bauer and Harry M. Cleaver, 'Student minority report on the Stanford research institute' (1969), http://la.utexas.edu/users/hcleaver/357L/StanfordMinorityReport.html

30 William Talbot, SRI's founding director, later worked for Bristol Meyers. E Finley Carter, director of SRI from 1956, previously worked for General Electric.

31 James D. Skee, 'A history of Stanford research institute', https://www.informs.org/Explore/History-of-O.R.-Excellence/Non-Academic-Institutions/Stanford-Research-Institute

32 Ann C. Bauer and Harry M. Cleaver, 'Student minority report on the Stanford research institute' (1969), http://la.utexas.edu/users/hcleaver/357L/StanfordMinorityReport.html

33 'Letter from the Vietnam and united states special financial groups to presidents Diem and Kennedy, 14 July 1961', in Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961–1963, Vol.1, https://history.state.gov/historicaldocuments/frus1961-63v01/d93

34 Wilfred Burchett, 'The receiving end', in The Pentagon Papers: Critical Essays, Vol. 5, edited by Noam Chomsky and Howard Zinn, The Senator Gravel Edition. Beacon Press (1972), p.60–81

35 Ann C. Bauer and Harry M. Cleaver, 'Student minority report on the Stanford research institute' (1969), http://la.utexas.edu/users/hcleaver/357L/StanfordMinorityReport.html

36 Ibid.

37 'Scenario planning', SRI International website, https://www.sri.com/hoi/scenario-planning/

38 'Overview', in World Investment Report 1993, Unctad (1993), https://worldinvestmentreport.unctad.org/wir1993/overview/

39 'Annex table 34: Number of parent corporations and foreign affiliates, by region and economy', World Investment Report 2011: Non-equity modes of international production and development UNCTAD (2011)

40 '69 of the richest 100 entities on the planet are corporations, not governments, figures show', Global Justice Now (17 October 2018), https://www.globaljustice.org.uk/news/69-richest-100-entities-planet-are-corporations-not-governments-figures-show/

41 'Chapter 8: How investors influence their governments', in Eugene Staley, War and the Private Investor: A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment (1935)

42 Ibid.

43 'One hundred years of remembrance', Harvard Political Review (16 June 2015), https://harvardpolitics.com/one-hundred-years-remembrance/

44 Gabriel García Márquez, One Hundred Years of Solitude (1967), Penguin edition (2014)

45 Pablo Neruda, 'La United Fruit Co', from Canto General (1950), http://dean.faculty.writing.ucsb.edu/Upload501B-Fall06/PabloNeruda.pdf

46 Stephen M. Streeter, 'Interpreting the 1954 U.S. intervention in Guatemala: Realist, revisionist, and postrevisionist perspectives', The History Teacher, 34:1 (2000), p.64.

47 'CIA and assassinations: The Guatemala 1954 documents', edited by Kate Doyle and Peter Kornbluh, National Security Archive Electronic Briefing book No.4, George Washington University, https://nsarchive2.gwu.edu/NSAEBB/NSAEBB4/

48 Patrick J. McDonnel, 'Guatemala's civil war devastated the country's indigenous Maya communities', The Los Angeles Times (3 September 2018), https://www.latimes.com/world/mexico-americas/la-fg-guatemala-war-aftermath-20180903-story.html

49 Andy Sullivan 'Chiquita pleads guilty to Colombia terror payments', Reuters (19 March 2007), https://www.reuters.com/article/idUSN19289952

Chapter 17

1 Sam Tabory, 'Colombian paramilitary leaders face decades in US prison', Insight Crime (10 June 2015), https://insightcrime.org/news/brief/colombian-paramilitary-leaders-sentencing-us-prison/

2 'Mancuso alleges paramilitary ties to politicians, retired generals, and businesses' Diplomatic cable from the US embassy in Bogota Colombia (18 May 2007), published by Wikileaks, https://wikileaks.org/plusd/cables/07BOGOTA3618_a.html

3 'Major Colombian cocaine trafficker extradited to the United States', United States Attorney Southern District of New York press release (5 March 2009), https://www.justice.gov/archive/usao/nys/pressreleases/March09/velozagarciaextraditionpr.pdf

4 'Paramilitaries' heirs: The new face of violence in Colombia', Human Rights Watch (3 February 2010), https://www.hrw.org/report/2010/02/03/paramilitaries-heirs/new-face-violence-colombia

5 'Cousin of Colombian ex-president Uribe jailed', BBC News (25 February 2011), https://www.bbc.com/news/world-latin-america–12532826

6 '14 members of Colombian paramilitary group extradited to the United States to face U.S. drug charges', US Department of Justice press release (13 May 2008), https://www.justice.gov/archive/opa/pr/2008/May/08-opa-414.html

7 'Doe v. Chiquita brands international', EarthRights website, https://earthrights.org/case/doe-v-chiquita-brands-international/

8 Maxwell W. Mahoney, 'Domestic corporation liability for foreign torts under the alien torts statute', American Bar Association (31 October 2018), https://www.americanbar.org/groups/litigation/committees/trial-practice/practice/2018/doe-v-nestle-et-al/

9 'Opinion and order' in response to Chiquita's motion to dismiss complaints on 11 July 2008. United States District Court, Southern District of Florida (3 June 2011), https://earthrights.org/wp-content/uploads/Chiquita-MTD-order.pdf

10 'Death of a statute: The Kiobel ruling', The center for progressive reform (19 April 2013), http://progressivereform.org/cpr-blog/death-of-a-statute-the-kiobel-ruling/

11 Adriaan Alsema, 'Coca Cola facing terrorism support charges in Colombia', Colombia Reports (30 August 2016), https://colombiareports.com/coca-cola-facing-terrorism-support-charges-colombia/

12 'Human rights claims against Chiquita for funding Colombian paramilitaries will proceed in U.S. Court', EarthRights press release (30 November 2016), https://earthrights.org/media_release/human-rights-claims-against-chiquita-for-funding-colombian-paramilitaries-will-proceed-in-u-s-court/

13 David Gormezano, 'Colombia signs new peace deal with FARC while critics cry foul', France24 (24 November 2016), https://www.france24.com/en/20161124-colombia-farc-rebels-sign-revised-peace-deal-uribe-conservatives-reject

14 Adriaan Anselma, 'Dole and Del Monte also facing crimes against humanity charges for financing death squads in Colombia: report', Colombia Reports (4 February 2017), https://colombiareports.com/amp/dole-belmonte-also-accused-crimes-humanity-financing-banana-death-squads-colombia-report/

15 'The dark side of coal: Paramilitary violence in the mining region of Cesar, Colombia', Pax for Peace Netherlands (June 2014), https://paxforpeace.nl/media/download/pax-dark-side-of-coal-final-version-web.pdf

16 'Honduras: The deadliest country in the world for environmental activism', Global Witness (31 January 2017), https://www.globalwitness.org/en/campaigns/environmental-activists/honduras-deadliest-country-world-environmental-activism/

17 'Situation in Honduras: Article 5 report', International Criminal Court (October 2015), https://www.icc-cpi.int/sites/default/files/iccdocs/otp/SAS-HON-Article_5_Report-Oct2015-ENG.PDF

18 'Prominent Honduran rural leader under police protection killed', Telesur (18 October 2016), https://www.telesurenglish.net/news/Prominent-Honduran-Rural-Leader-Under-Police-Protection-Killed–20161018-0036.html

19 'Private military and security companies in Honduras need robust and effective monitoring, says UN expert group', United Nations Human Rights Office of the High Commissioner (25 February 2013), http://newsarchive.ohchr.org/EN/NewsEvents/Pages/DisplayNews.aspx?NewsID=13032&LangID=E

20 Jennifer Catracha 'Miguel Facussé Barjum one of Honduras richest men passes away', Honduras News (23 June 2015), https://www.hondurasnews.com/miguel-facusse-barjum-one-of-honduras-richest-men-passes-away/

21 Elizabeth Malkin, 'In Honduras, land struggles highlight post-coup polarization', The New York Times (15 September 2011), https://www.nytimes.com/2011/09/16/world/americas/honduras-land-conflicts-highlight-polarization.html

22 '2012 predators of press freedom: Honduras – Miguel Facussé Barjum, Businessman and landowner', Reporters without Borders (4 May 2012), https://www.refworld.org/docid/4fa77ce1c.html

23 'French power giant terminates agreement with Miguel Facussé's company', Rel UITA (20 April 2011), http://www.rel-uita.org/ingles/french-power-giant-terminates-agreement-with-miguel-facusses-company/

24 Nina Lakhani, 'Two more Honduras land rights activists killed in ongoing violence', The Guardian (19 October 2016), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2016/oct/19/honduras-land-rights-activists-killed-unified-peasant-movement

25 'Corporacion Dinant S.A. de C.V., Summary of Proposed Investment', IFC Project information & Data Portal https://disclosures.ifc.org/project-detail/SPI/27250/corporacion-dinant-s-a-de-c-v

26 'IFC capitalization fund invests $70 Million in Ficohsa to Support SMEs in Honduras', IFC press release (30 September 2011), https://pressroom.ifc.org/all/pages/PressDetail.aspx?ID=23050

27 'International organizations immunities act, December 9, 1945', Yale Law School Lillian Goldman Law Library, https://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/decad034.asp

28 'Consultation draft: Dinant enhanced action plan' following the CAO Audit of IFC's Investment, IFC website (2 April 2014, archived 2 April 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20180402052413/http://www.ifc.org/wps/wcm/connect/227eb2004 39039759999b9869243d457/DinantConsultationEnhancedActionPlan_April2.pdf?MOD=AJPERES

29 'Dinant publishes 2016 annual progress report', Dinant (2 November 2016, archived 14 March 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170314204148/http://www.dinant.com/index.php/en/sala-de-prensa/comunicados/361-dinant-publishes-2016-annual-progress-report

Chapter 18

1 'The lawless zone: The transfer of policing and security powers to the civilian security coordinators in the settlements and outposts', Yesh Din (June 2014)

2 'Occupation Inc.: How settlement businesses contribute to Israel's violations of Palestinian rights', Human Rights Watch (January 2016), https://www.hrw.org/report/2016/01/19/occupation-inc/how-settlement-businesses-contribute-israels-violations

3 'Foreign direct investment, net inflows (BoP, current US$) – West Bank and Gaza', World Bank data, https://data.worldbank.org/indicator/BX.KLT.DINV.CD.WD?locations=PS

4 'Technologies of control: The case of Hewlett Packard', Who Profits and The Coalition of Women for Peace (December 2011), https://whoprofits.org/wp-content/uploads/2018/06/old/hp_report-_final_for_web.pdf.

5 'UN: Unemployment in Gaza highest in the world', Middle East Monitor (9 August 2016), https://www.middleeastmonitor.com/20160809-un-unemployment-in-gaza-highest-in-the-world/

6 Yotam Berger, 'After months of foot-dragging, Israel releases details of lethal shooting of Palestinian siblings', Haaretz (10 October 2016), https://www.haaretz.com/israel-news/2016-10-10/ty-article/israel-releases-details-of-lethal-shooting-of-palestinian-siblings/0000017f-db74-df62-a9ff-dff7df3e0000

7 'OECD report: Inequality worst in Israel and US', The Times of Israel (21 May 2015), https://www.timesofisrael.com/oecd-report-inequality-worst-in-israel-and-us/

8 Stuart Winer, 'One third of Israel's children live in poverty, report says', The Times of Israel (9 December 2015), https://www.timesofisrael.com/one-third-of-israels-children-live-in-poverty-report-says/

9 David Gutwein, 'The privatization revolution and social inequality policy in Israel', Sh'ma (May 2003), https://www.bjpa.org/content/upload/bjpa/may0/may03gutwein.pdf

10 'The Israeli company that fenced in Gaza eyes trump's Mexico wall', Bloomberg (1 August 2016), https://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2016-08-01/israel-s-magal-eyes-trump-wall-boasting-gaza-tested-smart-fence

11 'Refugees & migrants sea arrivals in Europe', UNHCR Regional Bureau Europe (June 2016), https://data.unhcr.org/en/documents/download/49921

12 'EU tracking 65,000 migrant smugglers: Europol', France24 (5 April 2018), https://www.france24.com/en/20180405-eu-tracking-65000-migrant-smugglers-europol

13 Mark Akkerman, 'Border wars: The arms dealers profiting from the refugee tragedy', Transnational Institute (July 2016), https://www.tni.org/files/publication-downloads/border-wars-report-web1207.pdf

14 'Gepsa', LinkedIn company profile https://it.linkedin.com/company/gepsa

15 'Engie 2018 results – Solid results confirming growth momentum', Engie (28 February 2019), https://www.engie.com/en/journalists/press-releases/engie-2018-results#:~:text=Revenues%20of%20EUR%2060.6%20billion,and%20organic%20basis%20versus%202017

16 'Resoconto Visita: Centro di Identificazione ed Espulsione "Brunelleschi"', MEDU (March 2016), http://www.cr.piemonte.it/dwd/organismi/garante_detenuti/2016/cie/RESOCONTO_CIE_TORINO_MEDU_24.06.16.pdf

17 Ibid.

18 Lorenzo Bagnoli, 'Milano, riapre ill Cie di via Corelli. L'appalto ai francesi di Gepsa. Protesta il Pd', Il Fatto Quotidiano (14 April 2014), https://www.ilfattoquotidiano.it/2014/04/14/milano-riapre-il-cie-di-via-corelli-lappalto-ai-francesi-di-gepsa-protesta-il-pd/951650/

19 'Incastrati: initiative civiche sulla gestione dei centri di accoglienza straordinaria per richiedenti asilo', Cittadinnanzattiva, Lasciatecientrare and Libera (February 2016)

20 'Neglected Trauma – Asylum seekers in Italy: an analysis of mental health distress and access to healthcare', MSF (July 2016), https://reliefweb.int/attachments/3cbd52b8-3788-3b0f-9be3-3bb017ecc508/neglected_trauma_report.pdf

21 Lydie Arbogast, 'Migrant detention in the European Union: A thriving business', Migreurop and the Rosa Luxemburg Stiftung Brussels Office (July 2016), http://migreurop.org/IMG/pdf/migrant-detention-eu-en.pdf

Chapter 19

1 'Since 1526', Beretta website, http://www.beretta.com/en/world-of-beretta/since-1526/

2 Niccolo Macchiavelli, The prince (1532), Penguin Classics edition (2003)

3 'Since 1526', Beretta website, https://www.beretta.com/en-us/world-of-beretta/since-1526/

4 'Le pistole del grigio-verde: Pistola Beretta Brevetto 1915', Carabinieri website (archived 7 June 2017), https://web.archive.org/web/20170607193055/https://www.carabinieri.it/arma/ieri/equipaggiamento-e-materiali/1910-1940/le-armi/le-pistole-del-grigio-verde-pistola-beretta-brevetto-1915

5 'Pistole e fucili per l'esercito argentino: Affare milionario per la Beretta' (5 January 2017), http://www.bresciatoday.it/economia/beretta-armi-argentina.html

6 'Group profile', Beretta Holding website, http://www.berettaholding.com/en/group-profile

7 'Centanex', LinkedIn company profile, https://www.linkedin.com/company/centanex/

8 'Steiner Defense', company website, https://es.steiner-defense.com/history

9 'Beretta concession, Harrods 2nd floor', Beretta website, https://www.beretta.com/en/harrods-2nd-floor/

10 'Financial highlights', Beretta Holding website, http://www.berettaholding.com/en/financial-highlights

11 'Press release: Beretta Holding approves 2015 consolidated results', Beretta Holding website, http://www.berettaholding.com/uploads/news/BH-comunicato-stampa-giugno-2016-eng-def.pdf

12 ‘Civilian inventories’, Small Arms Survey (archived 25 January 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20180125053053/http://www.smallarmssurvey.org/weapons-and-markets/stockpiles/civilian-inventories.html

13 ‘Product categories’, Small Arms Survey (archived 1 February 2018), https://web.archive.org/web/20180201224924/http://www.smallarmssurvey.org:80/weapons-and-markets/products.html

14 Daniel TERRILL, ‘New Beretta APX Ships to stores’, Guns.com (16 April 2017), https://www.guns.com/news/2017/04/16/new-beretta-apx-ships-to-stores

15 ‘The ultimate striker fired pistol’, Beretta website, https://www.beretta.com/en/striker-beretta-apx/

16 ‘The militarization of the US civilian firearms market’, Violence Policy Center (June 2011), http://www.vpc.org/studies/militarization.pdf

17 ‘Italian gun maker Beretta hits U.S. market with a bang’, The Plain Dealer (18 August 1993), reprint of Baltimore Sun article

18 ‘Italy-Libya arms deal shows weakness of EU code’, Andrew Rettman EU Observer (3 March 2011), https://euobserver.com/news/31915

19 ‘Franklin county man pleads guilty in shooting death of toddler’, Richmond Times-Dispatch (24 March 2017), http://www.richmond.com/news/virginia/franklin-county-man-pleads-guilty-in-shooting-death-of-toddler/article_c370c8f6-bfcf-5074-8897-081b48430fe9.html

20 ‘Ohio man gets life in prison for fatal shooting of teenage sisters’, US News (5 April 2017), https://www.usnews.com/news/us/articles/2017-04-05/ohio-man-gets-life-in-prison-for-fatal-shooting-of-teenage-sisters

21 Anna Hopkins, ‘Atlanta man, 42, “fatally shoots his new wife in their apartment doorway before placing her body in a car with her four young children”’, The Daily Mail (4 April 2017), http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-4379038/Atlanta-man-shot-new-bride-four-children.html

22 ‘Lawsuit: Teacher may have been able to prevent school shooting’, CBS Seattle (11 April 2017), http://seattle.cbslocal.com/2017/04/11/teacher-prevent-marysville-shooting/

23 ‘Ugo and Monique Beretta’, NRA Ring of Freedom website https://www.nraringoffreedom.com/our-members/ugo-and-monique-beretta/

24 ‘Beretta to move gun production from Maryland’, Baltimore Sun (22 July 2014), http://www.baltimoresun.com/news/maryland/politics/bs-md-beretta-moving-20140722-story.html

25 ‘Transcript of Jeff Reh’s Speech on New Plant in Tennessee’ Beretta website (29 January 2014) http://blog.beretta.com/transcript-of-jeff-rehs-speech-on-new-plant-in-tennessee

26 Samuel Blackstone, ‘Some people are furious about the security company heading the London Olympics’, Insider (15 June 2012), https://www.businessinsider.com/g4s-what-you-need-to-know-about-the-worlds-largest-private-security-world–2012–6

27 Chris Isidore, Rene Marsh and Alanna Petroff, ‘Orlando shooter was a security officer and cleared twice by his employer’, CNN, https://money.cnn.com/2016/06/12/news/companies/orlando-shooter-employer/index.html

28 'G4S must pay for cost of Birmingham prison riot, says Liz Truss', The Guardian (19 December 2016), https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2016/dec/19/g4s-must-pay-for-cost-of-birmingham-prison-riot-says-liz-truss

29 Peter Walker, 'Diane Abbott asks for explanation over denied access to Yarl's Wood', The Guardian (22 December 2017), https://www.theguardian.com/politics/2017/dec/22/diana-abbott-asks-for-explanation-over-denied-access-to-yarls-wood

30 G4S 2016 Annual Report, http://www.annualreport.g4s.com/documents/G4S_2016IR_Final_PDF.pdf

31 'Our history – 1901', G4S website, https://www.g4s.com/who-we-are/our-history#1901

32 'Global security services market by type, market and region, 12th Edition', Freedonia Group (January 2017), https://www.freedoniagroup.com/industry-study/global-security-services-market-by-type-market-and-region-12th-edition-3451.htm

33 Michael Williams and Rita Abrahamson, Security Beyond the State: Private Security in International Politics, Cambridge University Press (2010)

34 Small Arms Survey 2011, Chapter 4, http://www.smallarmssurvey.org/fileadmin/docs/A-Yearbook/2011/en/Small-Arms-Survey-2011-Chapter-04-EN.pdf

35 'Mercenaries unleashed: The brave new world of private military and security companies', War on Want (2016), http://media.waronwant.org/sites/default/files/Mercenaries%20Unleashed%2C%202016.pdf

36 Samuel Bowles and Arjun Jayadev, 'One nation under guard', The New York Times (15 February 2014), http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2014/02/15/one-nation-under-guard/?_r=0

37 'Private security services in India', GrantThornton (2015), https://www.grantthornton.in/globalassets/1.-member-firms/india/assets/pdfs/private_security_services_industry_in_india.pdf

38 'Rank-wise police strength during 2013', Open Government Data Portal India, https://data.gov.in/catalog/rank-wise-police-strength

39 Richard Godfrey, Jo Brewis, Jo Grady and Chris Grocott, 'The private military industry and neoliberal imperialism: Mapping the terrain', Organization, 21:1 (2014), p.106–25, http://citeseerx.ist.psu.edu/viewdoc/download?doi=10.1.1.834.687&rep=rep1&type=pdf

40 Alain Vicky, 'Cheap help from Uganda', Le Monde Diplomatique (May 2012), http://mondediplo.com/2012/05/05uganda

41 William Dalrymple, 'The East India Company: The original corporate raiders', The Guardian (4 March 2015), https://www.theguardian.com/world/2015/mar/04/east-india-company-original-corporate-raiders

42 Peter Singer, 'Corporate warriors: The rise and ramifications of the privatized military industry', International Security, 26:3 (Winter 2001/2002), https://www.brookings.edu/wp-content/uploads/2016/06/20020128.pdf

43 Ibid.

44 Ibid.

45 Hedley Bull, The Anarchical Society: A Study of Order in World Politics, Macmillan (1977)

46 Sean McFate, The Modern Mercenary: Private Armies and what They Mean for World Order, Oxford University Press (2014)

47 'Universal declaration of human rights', UN, http://www.un.org/en/universal-declaration-human-rights/

48 'Press release: Citizen insecurity thwarts Latin America's development says UNDP', UNDP (2013), http://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/presscenter/pressreleases/2013/11/12/citizen-insecurity-thwarts-latin-america-s-development-says-undp.html

49 'Bodyguards aren't just for celebrities anymore', Town and Country magazine (9 November 2016), http://www.townandcountrymag.com/society/money-and-power/a8518/bodyguards-wealthy-people/

50 'Protective security', Pinkerton website, https://www.pinkerton.com/protective-security/

51 Frankie McCoy, 'My local bobby: Meet the brave new world of elite law enforcement', Evening Standard (6 April 2017), http://www.standard.co.uk/my-local-bobby-meet-the-brave-new-world-of-elite-law-enforcement-a3507166.html

52 'Frinton residents pay security firm to patrol streets', The Guardian (3 November 2015), https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2015/nov/03/seaside-town-residents-frinton-pay-security-firm-patrol-streets

53 Frankie McCoy, 'My local bobby: Meet the brave new world of elite law enforcement,' Evening Standard (6 April 2017), http://www.standard.co.uk/my-local-bobby-meet-the-brave-new-world-of-elite-law-enforcement-a3507166.html

54 Westminster Security website, http://www.westminstersecurity.co.uk/

55 Richard Norton-Taylor, 'Corporate armies, drone terrorism, laser weapons – MoD's vision of future', The Guardian (11 July 2014), https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2014/jul/11/ministry-of-defence-vision-future-2045-security-threats

Chapter 20

1 Jo Ann Shroyer, Secret Mesa: Inside Los Alamos National Laboratory, Wiley (1997)

2 Jim Yardley, 'Land for Los Alamos lab taken unfairly, Heirs say', The New York Times (27 August 2001), https://www.nytimes.com/2001/08/27/us/land-for-los-alamos-lab-taken-unfairly-heirs-say.html

3 'Los Alamos is first for millionaires, magazine says', Albuquerque Journal (3 November 2011), https://www.abqjournal.com/67110/los-alamos-is-first-in-millionaires-magazine-says.html

4 'A long season of discontent', Bulletin of Atomic Scientists (January/February 2001), https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/pdf/10.2968/057001018

5 Michael Lucibella and Alaina G. Levine 'It's a bumpy ride to private management for Los Alamos, Livermore', APS News, 19:6 (June 2010), https://www.aps.org/publications/apsnews/201006/losalamos.cfm

6 Mathew Purdy and James Sterngold, 'The prosecution unravels: The case of Wen Ho Lee', The New York Times (5 February 2001), https://www.nytimes.com/2001/02/05/us/the-prosecution-unravels-the-case-of-wen-ho-lee.html

7 Dan Raile, 'The department of energy is the largest military and weapons racket in the U.S. Government', Pando Daily (6 April 2016), https://pandodaily.com/2016/04/06/profiteer

8 Shawn Tully, 'Meet the private company that has changed the face of the world', Fortune (17 May 2016), https://fortune.com/longform/bechtel-construction/

9 Sally Denton, The Profiteers: Bechtel and the Men Who Built the World, Simon & Schuster (2017)

10 Maud Beelman, Kevin Baron and others, 'US contractors reap the windfalls of post-war reconstruction', ICIJ (7 May 2012), https://www.icij.org/investigations/windfalls-war/us-contractors-reap-windfalls-post-war-reconstruction-0/

11 'Nuclear Connections', Western States Legal Foundation (Summer 2012), http://www.wslfweb.org/docs/Bechtel%20Nuclear%20Connections.pdf

12 Staci Matlock, 'A history of innovation and dysfunction at Los Alamos National Laboratory', Santa Fe New Mexican (2 January 2016), https://www.santafenewmexican.com/news/local_news/a-history-of-innovation-and-dysfunction-at-los-alamos-national-laboratory/article_6bde4aee-077f-56a6-836b-eab1d289271e.html

13 'Performance evaluation plans and reports for nuclear weapons sites', Nuclear Watch New Mexico website https://www.nukewatch.org/PERs-PEPs.html

14 Michael Lucibella and Alaina G. Levine 'It's a bumpy ride to private management for Los Alamos, Livermore', APS News, 19:6 (June 2010), https://www.aps.org/publications/apsnews/201006/losalamos.cfm

15 Ibid.

16 'Accident investigation report: Radiological release event at the waste isolation pilot plant on 14 February 2014', U.S. Department of Energy Office of Environmental Management (April 2014), https://wipp.energy.gov/Special/AIB_Final_WIPP_Rad_Release_Phase1_04_22_2014.pdf

17 Patrick Malone, 'Federal report: LANL violated environmental requirements', Santa Fe New Mexican (1 October 2014), https://www.santafenewmexican.com/special_reports/from_lanl_to_leak/federal-report-lanl-violated-environmental-requirements/article_37d62dc1-75fb-5976-be27-0f6772a3964c.html

18 W.J. Henningan and Ralph Vartabedian, "Los Alamos lab contractor loses $57 million over nuclear waste accident", The Los Angeles Times (11 January 2015), https://www.latimes.com/nation/la-na-los-alamos-fine-20150111-story.html

19 Mark Oswald, 'LANL nuclear safety panned in U.S. report', Albuquerque Journal (22 July 2015), https://www.abqjournal.com/616211/lanl-nuclear-safety-panned.html

20 Mark Oswald, 'New audit critical of Los Alamos lab management on fixing problems, safety issues', Albuquerque Journal (1 March 2016), https://www.abqjournal.com/733231/new-audit-critical-of-los-alamos-lab-management-on-fixing-problems-safety-issues.html

21 'US national laboratories, New Mexico and California', Bechtel website, https://www.bechtel.com/projects/us-national-laboratories/

22 Jeff Colvin, 'Effects of privatization on the DOE/NNSA Labs DOE/NNSA Labs' Science and Science and National Security Missions', presentation (24 January 2011), http://www.upte.org/NAStestimony.pdf

23 'Livermore lab settles age discrimination lawsuit for $37.25 Million', CBS News (1 October 2015), https://www.cbsnews.com/sanfrancisco/news/livermore-lab-settles-age-discrimination-lawsuit-for-37-25-million/

24 'Walter Tamosaitis, hanford site whistleblower: "I was fired because I raised nuclear safety issues"', Huffington Post (21 October 2013), https://www.huffpost.com/entry/walter-tamosaitis-hanford-site_n_4138629

25 Ralph Vartabedian, 'Hanford nuclear weapons site whistle-blower wins $4.1-million settlement', The Los Angeles Times (13 August 2015), https://www.latimes.com/nation/la-na-hanford-whistleblower-settlement-20150813-story.html

26 David Winograd, 'Whistleblower fired after raising safety concerns at federal nuclear site', TIME (18 February 2014), https://nation.time.com/2014/02/18/nuclear-waste-whistleblower-donna-busche-fired-hanford/

27 'New nuclear weapons and an attack on worker benefits', Amarillo Globe-News, https://eu.amarillo.com/story/news/local/2015/12/27/new-nuclear-weapons-and-attack-worker-benefits/13196689007/

28 Ibid.

29 'New nuclear weapons and an attack on worker benefits', Amarillo Globe-News, (27 December 2015) https://amarillo.com/story/news/local/2015/12/27/new-nuclear-weapons-and-attack-worker-benefits/13196689007/

30 Staci Matlock, 'A history of innovation and dysfunction at Los Alamos national laboratory', Santa Fe New Mexican (2 January 2016), https://www.santafenewmexican.com/news/local_news/a-history-of-innovation-and-dysfunction-at-los-alamos-national-laboratory/article_6bde4aee-077f-56a6-836b-eab1d289271e.html

31 Kenneth Chang 'Huge wildfire forces evacuation of los alamos, N.M.', The New York Times (11 May 2000), https://www.nytimes.com/2000/05/11/us/huge-wildfire-forces-evacuation-of-los-alamos-nm.html

32 Dennis Carroll, 'Firefighters defend sacred mountain in New Mexico', Reuters (6 July 2011), https://www.reuters.com/article/us-wildfires-new-mexico-pueblo-idUSTRE7647DV20110705

Epilogue

1 'French consortium kicks off an ICSID claim against Chile after USD 37 million loss due to COVID-19 pandemic', Investment Treaty News (23 March 2021), https://www.iisd.org/itn/en/2021/03/23/french-consortium-kicks-off-an-icsid-claim-against-chile-after-usd-37-million-loss-due-to-covid-19-pandemic/

2 William Neumann, 'Turnabout in Bolivia as Economy', The New York Times (16 February 2014), https://www.nytimes.com/2014/02/17/world/americas/turnabout-in-bolivia-as-economy-rises-from-instability.html

Index

Abax company 160
Abbott, Diane 202
Abrahamson, Rita 203
Abs, Hermann Josef 40–5, 47, 58, 169, 174
Abs-Shawcross Draft Convention 44
Acuarinto non-profit organisation 195
Adam Smith International company 68
Addis Ababa, Ethiopia 31, 90
ADM food company 67
Advanced Business Park (ABP), London 154
Afghanistan 2, 129, 205, 212
Africa 4, 23, 32, 37, 42, 61, 70–2, 85–7, 94, 96, 112, 158–62, 165, 171, 195, 197. See also South Africa; West Africa African and Eastern Trade Corporation 94 agribusinesses 85, 107, 109–12, 162 agriculture/agricultural 24, 65, 67, 78, 85–7, 106, 142, 162, 186, 189–90. See also farmers aid agency 67, 72, 83, 85, 116. See also specific agencies
AidEx 63
aid-funded business 61–70, 89
Aid-Funded Business Service 62
Alien Tort Statute (ATS) 182
Allied Denazification Board 41
American Federation of Labour and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) 143
Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. See British Petroleum
Antal, Nicole 153
'The Anti-Capitalist Attitude,' TIME magazine 40 anti-colonial liberation 42 anti-mining 10, 12–15, 17. See also mine/mining apartheid system 29–30, 34, 37
Arbenz, Jacobo 176 arbitration 27, 36–7, 43–4, 53, 159
Argentina 11, 20, 24, 128, 200, 221
Armas, Carlos Castillo 176
arquebus barrels 200
Articles of Agreement, the IFC's 75
Asia/Asian 4–5, 23, 25, 40, 58, 66, 97, 133, 139, 145, 150, 154. See also specific countries
Assange, Julian 1, 118
Asset Management Corporation (AMC), IFC-AMC 186
Association of Agroecological and Mining Fraternities of Guamocó (Aheramigua) 184 asylum seekers 133, 194, 196–8 atomic bombs 209, 212, 214, 217
Atomic City Transit 211
Atomic Man Duathlon 211
Aung San Suu Kyi 115, 120
Australia 198, 200, 204
Avance Ingenieros company 73
Avant, Deborah 205

Bach, Jonathan 131, 139
Baha, Eleanor 62
Bajo Aguán, Honduras 96, 185–6
Balfour Beattie company 67
Ban Ki-moon 89, 91
Bank Information Centre Europe 187

Barlow, Maude 58
Barroso, Jose Manuel 119
BBC 2, 43, 69
Bechtel Corporation 69, 211–14, 216–17
Bechtel, Warren A. 213
Belay, Million 86
Belgium 29, 93, 193
  Brussels 63–5, 119
Beltway Bandits 67
Beretta Holdings company 199–201
Berlin Conference (1884) 70
Berrios, Hector 17
Berry, Sian 154
Bhugeloo, Nousrath 160 bilateral investment treaties (BITs) 16, 20–1, 24, 27–9, 35–8, 46, 58, 119, 221, 225, 227 n.9
Bilderberg Conferences 172
Black Economic Empowerment 30, 33, 35, 52
Black, Eugene 42, 44–5
Blair, Tony 87
Bloom, Jonathan O. 83–4
Bolivia 27–8, 221
  Cochabamba 211, 221
Bolmorin, Jose 17
Bosch company 76
Bowles, Samuel 204
Brazil 25, 36, 76, 158
Bretton Woods Conference (1944) 45
Bretton Woods Project 76
Brickhill, Jason 34–5, 37
British empire 68–72, 94, 154
British Petroleum company 43
British Security Industry Association 207
British Virgin Islands 28
Broches, Aron 45–6
Brom, Shlomo 192
Brookings Institution think tank 205–6
Brown, Gordon 87
B'Tselem human rights group 190–1 budget support 64, 74
Bujara, Alfred 103–5
Bulgaria 101
Bulletin of Atomic Scientists 210
Bull, Hedley 206
Bunge company 67
Burchett, Wilfred 174
Burford Capital 27–8
Burma. See Myanmar (Burma)
Busche, Donna 215
Bush, George W. 19, 27, 83–4, 211 business-friendly reforms 65, 84, 122
BXR Group 162

Cabezas, Pedro 12–14, 18
Cambodia 128, 139–44
  Bavet 143–4
  Manhattan SEZ 141, 143
  Phnom Penh 139–43
Cameron, David 61, 91
campesinos 184–5
Canada 50, 55–7
  Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives 57
capitalism 39, 94, 120
'The Capitalist Challenge,' TIME magazine 39 CARE USA 87
Cargill 67, 85, 151
Carim, Xavier 36
Caritas NGO 194
Castillo, William 184
Cato Institute 173
Cayman Islands 95, 132
CDC (Colonial Development Corporation) 71–3, 75. See also Commonwealth Development Corporation
CDC Group plc 72, 95
Celebration Lakeside Park 150
Central America 12, 16, 26, 74–5, 112, 122, 176
  Guatemala 43, 176
  Honduras 75, 96, 122, 177, 185–8
Centre for Applied Legal Studies (CALS) 37
Centre for Investigative Journalism (CIJ) 1–2, 9, 26, 46–7, 131, 165, 178 centro d'identificazione ed espulsione (CIE, centre of identification and expulsion) 194
Cerén, Salvador Sánchez, 'buen vivir' (living well) 13
Channel Tunnel 57, 211 charity (organisations) 87–9, 194 chartered companies 69–70, 94, 133, 157, 176, 205, 208

Chea Vichea 141
Chile 24–5, 176, 220
China/Chinese 64, 119, 123, 125, 131, 133, 135, 137–8, 145, 154, 169, 174, 204
  Golden Shield programme 136
  Guangdong province 136
  hukou system of household registration 137
  Shenzhen 132–9, 145
China Minsheng Investment Corp 154
Chingomanje, Muhamad 165
Chiquita Brands International 43, 169, 175–84, 188, 220
Christian Democratic Union 51
Ciputra Group 148
Ciputra International City 148 civil society groups 30, 37, 58, 67, 77, 88, 90, 96, 106, 120, 159, 165 civil war 11–15, 74, 176, 179, 201, 205–6 climate change 26, 49, 51, 54, 219
Clyde & Co law firm 29
coal-fired power plant 47, 49–50, 54, 186
Coalition of Cambodian Apparel Workers' Democratic Union (CAWDU) 140
Coca-Cola Company 87, 140, 170, 176
Cold War 41, 47, 78, 119, 131, 145, 205, 216
Collingsworth, Terry 182
Colombia 176–7, 179–81, 188
  Bogotá 180–1
  civil war 179
  El Bagre 184
  Medellín 177, 179, 184
  Urabá 180–1
colonial empire 72, 171, 173, 205 colonialism 40, 42, 85–6
Colvin, Jeff 214
Commerce Gold company 16
commercial agriculture 86 commercial banks 45, 80, 98, 101, 109 commercial confidentiality 198, 212 commodity 67
Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (COMESA) 158 Commonwealth Development Corporation 72
communism 45, 105, 174–5
Communist Party 136
compacts, Millennium Challenge Corporation 83–4
Compliance Advisor Ombudsman (CAO) 96
Confederation of European Security Services (CoESS) 204
Congo colony 92–5
Consolidated Nuclear Security (CNS) 214 contractors 64–5, 67–9, 95, 190–1, 195–8, 202, 205–6, 210, 212–16, 219
Control Risks Group 205
convivirs (self-defense groups) 180–1 cooperation frameworks, New Alliance 85–7
Corporate Accountability International 77 corporate colonialism/colonialists 93–5 corporate control 4, 54, 171, 175 corporate partnerships 88, 211 corporate social responsibility (CSR) programmes 80
Cortez, Yanira 14–15, 17, 73
Cotula, Lorenzo 121
Covid-19 pandemic (impact of) 65, 220
Cragun, Ryan 151
Cripps, Sir Stafford 71
Croatia 101, 106
Crowell & Moring corporate law firm 19
Crown Agents 68–9, 72
The Cunard Building, England 62
Customs Free Airport Act (1947), Ireland 126 cyanide 15–16
Czarzasty, Jan 104–5
Czech Republic 51, 106

Daily Mail 64
Dalrymple, William 69
Dearden, Nick 89
death squad 12, 74, 183
De Beers Group 79, 127
Decker, Stephanie 72 democracy 2, 4, 18, 26, 47, 51, 56, 120–1, 123, 132–3, 170–3, 175, 203, 207, 219–20
Deng Xiaoping 130, 136–7
Denmark 65
  Copenhagen 202

Denton, Sally 211
Desai, Unmesh 155
de Schutter, Olivier 86
Deseret Ranch 151
Deutsche Bank 40–1 developing countries 21, 25–6, 35, 41, 43, 45, 47, 64–5, 67–8, 87, 90, 121, 128, 160, 192 development finance 71–4, 89, 95–6, 101, 105, 115
Dinant corporation 96, 185–8 direct investments 72, 122, 189 disaster relief 62 discrimination 29, 210, 215
Disney World 150
distribution projects, electricity 84
Dole and Del Monte fruit companies 184 do-no-harm approach 217
Draper, Peter 36–7
Dutch East India Company 157
Dyncorp company 206

Earthrights International NGO 177, 181–3, 185–8
The East India Company 69, 115, 133, 146, 205, 208 economic free zones (EFZs) 122, 139 economic growth 90, 119, 132, 139, 141
Ecopark 149
Edmonds, Patrick 129
Egypt 43–4, 75, 130, 193
Électricité de France power company 186
Elliott, David 174
Ellsberg, Daniel 1
El No de Tokyo 24–5
El Salvador 9–10, 15–16, 18–19, 25–30, 34, 43, 46–7, 52, 56, 72, 74–5, 96, 119, 220
  El Dorado 16, 19
  Festival of Resistance 9, 20
  Independence day 9, 16–18, 20
  Metrocentro 74
  Pacific Rim vs. El Salvador 10–13, 17, 19–21
  San Salvador 12, 73–4
  Villa Veranda housing community 72–4
Empresa Electrica Guaracachi 28
empresas recuperadas (recovered businesses) 221
Energy Charter Treaty 51, 56
Engels, Friedrich 93
ENGIE Cofely 195 enterprise zones 122, 134, 153 environment/environmental 2, 4, 9, 11–16, 18, 49–55, 57, 73, 79, 90, 95–6, 103, 106, 109, 111, 121, 148, 150–2, 162, 173–4, 185, 187, 206, 212–19 equity and diversity 217
  equity investments 76–9, 106, 109, 163–4
Escobar, Mario Uribe 182
Escobar, Pablo, 'Medellín Cartel' 177
Ethyl company 57
European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD) 101–7, 221
European Commission 53, 119
European Roundtable of Industrialists 173
European Union (EU) 63, 119, 129, 201
Europe/European 4–5, 11, 23, 35, 37, 39, 41–3, 45, 47, 51–3, 58, 61, 68, 85, 94, 96, 100–2, 109–10, 112, 123, 125, 138, 145, 162, 169–71, 187, 193–4, 205–6, 208, 220. See also specific countries
  investors 30
  River Elbe 49–51
export processing zones (EPZs) 122
Exxon-Mobil Corporation 57

Fabbri, Tommaso 194
Facility for Investment Climate Advisory Services (FIAS) 121
Facussé, Miguel 96, 185 farmers 11, 17, 20, 80, 86–7, 101, 117, 149, 165, 171, 186–8, 220. See also agriculture/agricultural Faso, Burkina 85
FEMSA company 76
Feronia Inc 95
financial crisis 88–9, 132
Finstone Group 30, 32
Fischer, Bram 34
Flores, Jose Angel 185
Florida Native Plant Society 151

FMO, Dutch aid agency 164 forced labour 44, 94–5 foreign investment/investors 4, 11, 16, 21–2, 25, 27, 33, 35–6, 38, 40, 43–7, 51, 53, 56–7, 76–8, 89, 98–9, 103, 118–20, 127–8, 136–7, 139, 145, 149, 159, 161, 185, 189. See also private investment/investors
Forsyth, Justin 87
France/French 20, 43, 50, 57, 141, 160, 193–5, 211, 220
  Paris 43, 64
Freedom of Information Act 212
Freedonia Group 202
Friedman, Milton 169
Funes, Mauricio 11

G4S company 202
Garner, Robert 75
gated community 73–4, 80, 96, 148
Gaz de France company 195
Geddes, John, Ronin Concepts 208
gender 29, 142
General Motors company 75, 83 genocide 115, 141, 176
George, Susan 173
George Washington University 43
Gepsa company 194–6
Germany 5, 41, 47–56, 58, 100–1, 200
  Berlin 39
  German investors 49
  green energy transition 47
  Greenpeace Hamburg office 52
  Hamburg (see Hamburg, Germany)
  Vattenfall vs Germany 49–56
Ghana, West Africa 42, 71, 85, 88, 163, 197
Ghiglione, Giorgio 199
Ghosh, Jayati 90–1
GlaxoSmithKline (GSK) company 88
Glencore Xstrata company 32 global business companies system, Mauritius 158–9, 162, 165
Global Commission on Business and Sustainable Development 91
Global Justice Now campaign group 89 global private security market 202
Global Rights Index, ITUC 142
GMAC garment manufacturers association 142
GOCO (Government Owned, Contractor Operated) model 214–15
Godwin, Peter 119
Golden Ring of Freedom, NRA's 201
Golden Shield project, China 136
Gordon, Neve 192
Great Depression 170, 172
Greater London Authority (GLA) 154–5
Greening, Justine 88, 91
gross national income (GNI) 65
Gross Receipts Taxes (GRT) 216
Grupo Poma 74–5
Grupo Roble 75
Gulabchand, Ajit 145
Gutwein, Daniel 193

Haddad, Iyad 191
Hall, David 152–3
Hamburg, Germany 49–56, 232 n.18
  Christian Maas 55
  G20 summit in (2017) 50
  Gählerpark 54
  Green Party 51–2, 56
  remunicipalization 54–5
  Unser Hamburg, Unser Netz (Our Hamburg, Our Networks) campaign 55 Hanford 212, 215
Hardie, Craig 164
Harrison, Sarah 1
Hayek, Fredrich 172
Healey, Denis 172
'Health in Africa' initiative, IFC 108
Heaven plc 41
Henriet, Benoît 94
Heritage Foundation think tank 173
Hever, Shir 192–3
Hewlett-Packard company 189
High Level Panel of Eminent Persons on the Post-2015 Development Agenda 91
Hillwood Investments 75
Hitler, Adolf 41
Honeywell company 214
Hong Kong 70, 132–3, 135–6
  Kowloon 133
  umbrella movement in 135

Horgan, Edward 130
Hörmann, Günther 56
Huileries du Congo Belge 94
Hu Jintao 135
hukou system of household registration 137
Humanitarian Action Corporation for Coexistence and Peace in Northeast Antioqueño (Cahucopana) 184 human rights 11, 14, 27, 31, 34–5, 37, 46–7, 118, 142, 177, 181–5, 187, 190–1, 195–6
Hun Sen 141
Hunt, Haroldson Lafayette, Jr. 96
Hunt Oil Company 96
Hunt, Ray Lee 96
Hwin'dadi, Omari 80

Ibarra, Ángel 13–14
immigrant/immigration 135, 194, 198, 202 incentives 78, 84, 86, 117, 122, 137, 154, 158 independent accountability mechanism 96
Independent newspaper 41
India 25, 36, 64, 68–9, 71, 95, 119, 133, 145–7, 158–9, 186, 204
  Kandla SEZ 145
  Kodaikanal 95
  Lavasa 145–7
  Mauritius's tax treaty with 158 indirect investments 186
Indonesia 95, 148, 174
Industrial Revolution 39, 61
International Bank for Reconstruction and Development 106
International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID) 15, 19, 22–30, 33–4, 36, 39, 45–7, 49–52, 57–8, 76
International Chamber of Commerce 172
International Commerce Centre 133
International Consortium for Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) 164
International Criminal Court 185
International Development Act (2002) 67 international development system 3, 65, 73–4, 78–80, 90, 95, 98, 109, 115, 186, 220
International Festival for Business (2014) 61–2
International Finance Corporation (IFC) 41, 74–80, 95–102, 104–12, 115, 121, 130, 161–5, 186–8
International Industrial Development Conference (IIDC) 39–40, 174
International Institute for Environment and Development 121
International Labour Organization (ILO) 117, 121
International Monetary Fund (IMF) 45, 78, 103, 160, 192
International Organizations Immunities Act (1945) 186 International Slavery Museum 61 international tax treaties 158
International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) 142 International Workers' Day (May Day) 137 investment climate 24, 120 investment treaties. See bilateral investment treaties (BITs) investor-state dispute settlement (ISDS) system 18–20, 22, 24–6, 27, 30, 34–9, 43, 45–6, 49, 53, 56–7, 71, 73, 76, 78, 112, 120, 122, 131, 161, 220
Iran 43
Iraq 2, 25, 62, 69, 129, 205, 208, 212
Ireland 154
  Shannon 123, 125–32
  Sixmilebridge 126, 128
Irish Human Rights Commission 129
Israel Defense Forces (IDF) 189–92
Israeli Border Police 190
Israel/Israeli 43, 189–93
Italy 29, 85, 188, 193–6, 198–201
  Brescia 199, 201
  Gardone Val Trompia 199
  Italian investors 31–3, 36, 47, 50
  Italian Riviera 147, 193
  Lake Como 199
  Turin 194–6, 198–9

Jacobs, Jonathan 164
Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) 116–17
Japan/Japanese 36, 84, 115–16, 140, 143, 217
Jayadev, Arjun 204
Jerusalem 189–90
Joiet, Louis 198
Jones, Frederick 78
Jugnauth, Pravind 161

Kabwe, Zitto 86–7
Kaiser Family Foundation 90
Kandla SEZ, India 145
Kasaa, Joseph 80
Kates, Jen 90
Kaufland supermarket chain 101, 103, 105, 107
Ken Loo 142
Kennedy, John F 127, 174
Kenya 80, 174
Kerstan, Jens 52, 56
Kim, Jim 160
King, Martin Luther, Jr. 42
King & Wood Mallesons law firm 27
Kirtland Air Force Base 214
Kishimoto, Satoko 55
Klein, Naomi 136
K&L Gates law firm 29
Knirsch, Jürgen 52
Kolomiets, Natalia 111
Kosiuk, Yuriy 110
Koursh, Saar 193
Kraftwerk Moorburg power plant 51
Kumar, Krishan 145
Kumar, Vikram 97–8
Kuok, Robert 97

Labbé, Danielle 150 labour laws 104, 131–2, 139
Lam Wing-kee 135
Lancaster, Sir Timothy, The Politics and Economics of Britain's Foreign Aid: The Pergau Dam Affair 66, 68
Laos 142
Latin America 13–16, 23–5, 43, 78, 96, 176–7, 184, 195, 207–8, 220
Lavasa Corporation Limited (LCL) 146
Lavasa Information Centre 147
Lavasa International Convention Centre 146
Lawrence Livermore lab, California 214
Lawrence Livermore National Security (LLNS) LLC 214 Law, Steven 97
lawsuits 56, 177, 182, 186, 188, 210, 212, 215
legal cases 10, 15–16, 18, 35, 55, 67, 177
  Doe v. Chiquita Brands International 183
  Doe vs IFC 187–8
  Foresti vs South Africa 29–30, 34, 36–7
  Pacific Rim vs El Salvador 10–13, 17, 19–21
  Vattenfall vs Germany 49–56
  Vivendi vs Argentina 20
Legal Resources Centre (LRC) 34
Leone, Sierra 203
Leon, Peter 33
Lever Brothers 93–4
Lever, William 93
Libya 193, 197, 201
Lidl supermarkets (Europe's Wal-Mart) 100–5, 107–8, 169, 220
Liverpool 61, 63–5, 72, 94
Livingstone, Grace, Inside Colombia: Drugs, Democracy and War 183
Lockheed Martin 214
Loewenstein, Antony 189
Lo Hsing Han 97
London 1, 4, 9, 19, 24–5, 27–8, 38–9, 61, 63, 68, 75, 79, 87, 90, 106, 118, 120–1, 125, 129, 133–4, 153–5, 200, 202, 221
London Stock Exchange 110
Lone Pine energy company 57
Lonmin mine, massacre of striking workers 32
Look East policy, Malaysia's 66
Lopez, Luis 14
Lord Trefgarne 72
Los Alamos National Laboratory 210
Los Alamos National Security (LANS) LLC 211
Lowcock, Mark 68
Lowenfeld, Andreas 25

Luce, Henry 39
Lutchmeenaraidoo, Vishnu 158
Luxembourg 29–30, 65, 195

MacFadyen, Gavin 1–5, 9–10, 26, 47–8, 95–6, 112, 121, 123, 132, 165–6, 170, 177–8, 218, 220, 222
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 'The Prince' treatise 200
Macmillan, Harold 71
MacWilliam, Nick 177
Magal Security Systems 193
Magna Carta 42, 75, 174
Mahathir bin Mohamad 65–8
Malawi 86, 162, 164–5
Malawi Mangoes (Mauritius) Limited 162–6
Malaysia 55, 66–7, 70, 130, 234 n.25
Mancuso, Salvatore 181–2
Mandela, Nelson 29, 34
Manhattan Project 209, 212
Manhattan SEZ, Cambodia 141, 143
Manning, Chelsea 2
Maputo accord (2003) 85
Marcu, Mihai 108–9
Márquez, Gabriel García, One Hundred Years of Solitude 176
Masacre de las Bananeras (Banana massacre) 176
Masisi, Mpho 33
El-Masri, Khaled 129
mass trespass protests 154
Matthiae, Astrid 54
Mauritius. See also Malawi Mangoes (Mauritius) Limited economic development of 157–9 inequality 160–1
  Port Louis 157, 160–3
Mauritius Offshore Business Activities Act (1992) 158
Mauro, Maurizio 194
McCone, John 211
McDonald, David 55
McFate, Sean, The Modern Mercenary 206
Mchomvu, Bernard 84
McIntyre, W. David 71
McNamara, Robert 76
Meade, James 157, 161
Medecins sans Frontieres (MSF) report 194, 197
Medici per i diritti umani (Doctors for Human Rights) 195
MedLife company 108–9
Meera 9–11, 15–16, 58
Mello, Greg 212
Meltdown Rock Climbing Competition 209
mercenaries 165, 200, 205
mercury 15, 95
Mettetal, Gilles 107
Mexico 56
Meyersfeld, Bonnie 37–8
The Middle East 4, 130, 162, 205 migrants/migration 16, 53, 57, 137–8, 193–4 migration security market 194
Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) 83–4 Millennium Development Goals 89, 138
Minaco company 32
mine/mining. See also anti-mining; specific companies ban of 10–11, 13, 15, 17–18, 20, 220 coal mine 32, 93, 106 gold 9–10, 15, 18, 31, 184 legal cases (see legal cases) toxic substances to extract metal 15–16
Mitchell, Andrew 68, 72
Model Cities programme, Honduras 122
Modi'in Ezrachi company 190–1
Moeun, Tola 139
Molina, Nuria 87–8, 90 money 3, 11, 20, 26, 45, 83–4, 88–9, 196 aid funding 61–4, 85 compensation 10, 16, 27, 30, 44, 117–18
  development finance 100, 107 international development 73, 75, 80, 98, 169 pocket money 197
Montaño, Chuck, Los Alamos: Secret Colony, Hidden Truths 210
Mont Pelerin Society 172
Moorburgstrasse Stoppen! campaign 54
Morales, Evo 221

Mozambique 55, 86, 132
MS-13 criminal gang 12 multinational companies 20, 27, 32, 67–8, 70, 76–7, 88, 90, 92, 96, 100, 104, 106, 141, 146, 158–9, 163, 175, 182–5, 195, 202, 208
Mwinyi, Ali Hassan 78
Myanmar (Burma) 4, 97–9, 100, 112, 115–22, 126, 130, 132, 203
  Bogyoke Aung San Market 98 displacement of farmers 116–18
  Naypyidaw (Seat of the King) 115–16
  Thilawa SEZ 116–18
  Yangon 97–100, 115–16
'My Local Bobby' subscription-based service 207
Myronivsky Hliboproduct (MHP) 110–11

Napoleon III 44
Nasser, Gamal Abdel 75
nationalization 43–4, 78–9
Native American 216
Nazi regime 41
neoliberalism 172–3 neo-Nazis 2–3
Neruda, Pablo 176
The Netherlands 65, 163
  Amsterdam 55, 162, 173, 194
Neveling, Patrick 122–3
New Alliance for Food Security and Nutrition in Africa 85–6
NewCities non-profit organisation 146 newly independent countries 42, 72, 115, 173, 175
New Mexico (Land of Enchantment)
  Albuquerque 209, 212, 214
  Carlsbad incident 213, 216
  Cerro Grande Fire 217
  Espanola 216–17
  Las Conchas Fire 217
  Los Alamos (lab) 209–14, 216–18 nuclear waste 213, 215
Newton, Stewart 162
New Urbanism 145–6
NewVistas project 152–3
New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards 119
NGOs (non-government organisations) 13, 63, 67–8, 73, 76–8, 87–91, 100, 108, 111, 136, 163, 177, 181–6, 202
Nigeria 108, 164, 196
Nigeria Export Processing Zones Decree 131
Nixon, Richard 42, 169, 172
Nkrumah, Kwame 42
Non-Aligned Movement 78
North America 23, 125, 200
North American Free Trade Act (NAFTA) 27, 56–7
Northwest Santa Tecla Ecological Defence Committee 73
Norway 65
nuclear deterrence 216
Nuclear Watch New Mexico group 212 nuclear weapons (programmes) 210–11, 214–17, 219
Nyerere, Julius 78–9, 103

Obama, Barack 85
Occupation Inc, Human Rights Watch report 189
Occupy London 65
OceanaGold mining corporation 11, 18 official development assistance (ODA) 64, 160
O'Keeffe, Georgia 209
'One Country, Two Systems' principle 132
One Exchange Square 106
Ordman, John 181
O'Regan, Brendan 126–8, 169
Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) 46, 64, 120
Organization for American States 204
Otto Reich Associates firm 19
Ou Tepphallin 143
Overseas Development Administration (ODA) 66
Oxfam 87, 108, 163–4

Pacific Rim mining company 10–15, 17, 19–21
Pakistan 71, 131

Palestine/Palestinians 188–94
Gaza 189–90, 193
West Bank 189–91
palm plantations, Unilever 95–6
Pantex Plant 215
Parada, Luis 19–24, 26–7, 30
paramilitary group, violence of 177–88
Parapolitics scandal 182 partnerships corporate 211, 214 international commercial 61 journalism 178
NGO-business 87–9
public-private 87, 90
Pasquier, Bernard 74
Pazuki, Sam 11
peasants/peasantry 174, 177
Peiray, Jenny 147
Penny, James 61
People's Republic of China 132
Pergau Dam aid-for-arms scandal (1990s) 66–8
Permanent Court of Arbitration, The Hague 27, 57
Permanent Observatory on Small Arms (Opal), Brescia 201
Perot, Ross 75
Perry, Guillermo 78
Peters, Nigel 62
Petra Diamonds company 79
CSR programmes 80
Philip Morris company 67
Philippines 25, 131, 140
Manila 77
Phnom Penh Special Economic Zone (PPSEZ) 140–1
Piana, Catherine 206
Pineda, Roger 187
Pipa, Tony 89–90
Poland 100, 103–5, 107, 208
Polman, Paul 91, 95
Pol Pot 141
Poma, Ricardo 74–5
poverty reduction 22, 47, 66, 76–7, 79, 91, 100, 138, 221
Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers (PRSPs) 77
Powell, Lewis 172–3
Powell Memo 172
PricewaterhouseCoopers 68, 160 private business/companies 3, 42, 45, 69, 74–6, 78, 83, 88, 90, 95, 100, 106, 108, 121, 140, 148, 161–2, 169–71, 175, 193–4, 196, 202, 205–6, 208, 211, 216–17. See also specific companies private equity funds 106, 163 private healthcare company 95–6, 105, 108 private investment/investors 40–1, 46, 65, 69, 85–7, 97, 99, 118, 120–1, 122, 150–1, 154, 171, 175. See also foreign investment/investors privately-owned public spaces (POPS) 154 private sector 83, 88, 90, 106, 108, 161–2, 205
Private Security Companies 205, 207 private security guards 165, 190, 204, 207 Private Security Monitor programme, at the University of Denver 205 privatisation/privatization 20, 41, 54–5, 67, 72, 76–7, 84, 103, 106, 173, 188, 192–4, 203, 207, 210–14, 216, 221 privileged links 172 profit-making 49, 76, 120, 176, 186, 201
Progress through Partnering programme, New Mexico 216 protests/protesters 1, 26, 37, 50–1, 54, 65, 68–9, 77, 95, 103, 115–16, 131, 133, 134–6, 140, 143–4, 149–50, 152, 154, 176, 186, 191–2, 195, 202, 205, 212 public-private partnership 87, 90
Puerto Rico 123
Pussy Riot punk band 1

Qalandia checkpoint, Jerusalem 189–90 quasi-totalitarian governance model 146
Queen Elizabeth II 66, 106 pink diamonds of 79
Queen Rania of Jordan 91 race/racial 29–30, 38, 121, 210

Rahmah, Abdallah Abu 192

Rathi, Mukund 146
RCA electronics 39
Reagan, Ronald 127, 169, 173, 192
Red Cross 193, 195 refugees/refugee camps 15, 57, 62, 194
regulatory chill 35
Reporters without Borders NGO 185
Reuters press agency 2, 151
Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) 183
Rhodes, Cecil 5
Richards, Roger 215
Rio Tinto company 27
Ritz Crackers 39
Rivera, Marcelo 17
Rockefeller, David 41
Rockefeller, Nelson 75, 169
Rock, Jailhouse 40
Rodney, Walter, How Europe Underdeveloped Africa 94
Rogers Capital 162
Roll, Eric 41
Romania 101, 106–9
  Bucharest 107–9
Romer, Paul 122
Romney, Mitt 74
Rote Flora, Hamburg 50
Royal Albert Dock 154
Royal Docks Enterprise Zone 154
Royal Niger Company 70, 94
Ruggie, John 27
Rurelec PLC 27–8
Russia 41–2, 158, 200
Ryan, Paul 128

Sacca, Michael 153
Saffron Revolution (2007) 115
Sakia, John 84
Sánchez, Gimena 184
Sanctuary movement 15
Sandia National Laboratory 214
San Sebastian mine 16
Saucedo-MacQuade, Brookes 209
Save the Children UK 87–8, 90
School of Mines, Johannesburg 37
Schwarz, Dieter 101
Schwarz Group 101, 107
Scramble for Africa 70
Security beyond the State 203
Sein, Thein 119
Serbia 101, 106
Shangri-La Asia Limited 97
Shangri-La luxury hotel, Yangon 97–100, 115
Shangri-La resort, Maldives 97
Shannon Development company 129
Shannon Free Zone 126, 128
Shannon Group plc 129
Shannon International Development Consultants (SIDC) 128
Shannonwatch group 130
Sharda Metal Industries factory 145 shareholders 78, 108, 162, 164, 212, 220
Shawcross, Hartley William 44–5
Sheehey, Pete 216
Shenzhen SEZ, China 130, 137, 145 shopping malls 73–4, 103, 116, 129, 148
Shrake, Thomas C. 11
Shultz, George P. 211
Siemans company 76
Singer, P. W. 205
Singh brothers (Malvinder and Shivinder) 95 slavery 61
Slobodian, Quinn, Globalists: The End of Empire and the Birth of Neoliberalism 172 Small Arms Survey project 200, 203 small-scale trader, struggles of 107
Smith, Joseph 152
Snowden, Edward 1, 133
Sobotyuk, Anastasiya 111
Solidarity Centre 143
Solidarity trade union, Poland 103 sound policy 72
South Africa 4, 25, 33–8, 43, 46–7, 50, 52, 56, 71, 79, 119, 203, 227 n.9
  black South Africans 30, 33, 37
  Foresti vs South Africa 29–30, 34, 36–7
  Johannesburg 29, 31–4, 36–7
  Marikana Tombstones 31–3
  Mineral and Petroleum Resources Development Act 30
Southeast Asia 70, 97, 115, 141
Southern Agricultural Growth Corridor (SAGCOT) 87 sovereign/sovereignty 16, 20, 24–5, 30, 52, 122, 166, 171, 173, 176, 206
Soviet Union 103, 105

Spain 16, 41, 76, 177, 227 n.9
Special Air Service (SAS), British army's 207
Special Economic Zone Act (2005)
  Cambodia 139
  India 145
special economic zone (SEZ) 116, 126, 130–2, 135, 137, 139–45, 165, 174, 219
Springett, Simon 157
Sri Lanka 71, 130
Staley, Eugene 169–77, 206, 218
  Staley Report 174
  War and the Private Investor 169–70, 175
Stanford Research Institute (SRI) think tank 169, 174–5
Steele, Jonathan 136
Steinart, Alex 161
St John, Taylor 46
Strauss, Levi 141 street markets 105, 108
strikes 33, 95, 131, 139–40, 143–4, 171, 176, 215 Structural Adjustment Programs (SAPs) 76–7, 103, 192 subcontractors 64, 213–14 submarine cable 84
sub-Saharan Africa 158, 163
Suez Canal Company 43–4, 75, 195
Suez Crisis 43, 75
Sunderland, David, Managing the British Empire 69 supranational 4, 43, 170, 172, 175 sustainability, environmental 14, 54, 90 Sustainable Development Goals 89–91
Sweden 51, 65
Switzerland 87, 204
  Geneva 36, 62, 172, 200
Sydnor, Eugene, Jr. 172
Syria 62

Take Back the City campaign 154
Tamosaitis, Walter 215
Tanesco company 84
Tanzania 78–80, 83–7, 103 cooperation frameworks 85–7
  Dar es Salaam 79–80, 84
  MCC compact 84
  Tanzanian Horticultural Association 86
  Zanzibar 83–5
Taraporevala, Persis 146 tax/taxation 47, 86, 90, 121–2, 127, 129, 139, 145, 154, 158–61, 216 corporate taxes 42, 128, 160 excessive 43
  India–Mauritius tax treaty 158 international tax treaties 158 sugar tax 95 tax evasion 163–4 tax haven 132, 157, 159–63 taxpayers 26, 47, 54, 57–8, 63, 65, 83, 211, 213–14
Tejara, Edith 73
Tewa Women United organisation 217
Thatcher, Margaret 5, 65–8, 70, 72, 169, 173, 192
Thilawa SEZ, Yangon 116–18 think tanks 121, 146, 169, 173–5, 205 third-party funders 27–8, 56
Thompstone, Kevin 129, 130–1
Thorn, Ath 144
TIME-LIFE International media group 39, 174
TIME magazine 39–43, 47, 169 tourism 84, 97–8, 142, 157, 199 trade 62, 65, 105, 119, 154, 198, 200–1 free trade 56, 129
  gun trade 201 international trade 27, 61, 121, 158 slave 61
  subnational 122
  trade union 101, 103, 105, 121, 140, 143, 183–4 Transatlantic Business Dialogue 173 transfer pricing 159 transnational corporations 221 treaty-shopping 159 tribunal 11, 13, 16, 18, 20, 25–30, 33, 36–7, 44, 46, 50–1, 56–7, 103, 120
Trinity Test Site 217
Trujillo, Patricia 216
Tsosie-Pena, Beata 217
Turkey 106, 200

Uematsu, Hiroshi 140
Uganda 80, 163–4, 205
UK aid-funded contracts/contractors 68–9
Ukraine 109–11
  farmland controlled by foreign companies 110

Kyiv 109, 111
poultry production in 110–11
Vinnytsia region 109–10, 112 umbrella movement in Hong Kong 135
Umeme Holdings company 164
UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) 159
unemployment 149, 170, 190, 199, 203
Unilever company 67, 70, 85, 91–2, 94–5
United Africa Company (UAC) 70, 94
United Fruit Company 43, 175–6. See Chiquita Brands International
The United Kingdom 5, 28, 43–4, 50, 57, 62, 65–8, 95–6, 100–1, 117, 119, 157, 164, 173, 192, 204, 207–8
CDC development finance 71–3, 75, 95
Department for International Development 67–8, 88 economy of 71–2
Independent Commission on Aid Impact 85
Ministry of Overseas Development 72
The United Nations 12, 46, 62–3, 89, 142, 157, 176, 190, 198, 207
United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia (AUC) 177, 181–3
The United States 1, 29, 32, 36, 43, 47, 57–8, 62, 67, 72, 76, 88, 105, 116, 122, 125, 136, 138, 143, 146, 150, 170, 172–7, 181–3, 186, 189, 201–2, 204–6, 208, 211
Beretta guns in 200
Chicago 125, 169–71, 211
fast food chains 73–4
Florida 150–1, 202 food aid 67
Missouri 214
New York 41, 89, 125, 129, 131
San Francisco conference 39–45, 47–8, 169, 174
San Sebastián river 15, 20
Texas 16, 214–15
US-controlled IBRD 94
US military 3, 129–30, 201
Vermont 152–3
violence at Catholic missionaries 12
Washington DC 10–11, 13, 18–19, 21–2, 30, 32, 46, 51–2, 67, 75–8, 83, 91, 122, 158, 181–2, 186, 212, 215, 221
University of California 211, 216
URS Corporation 215
Uruguay 195
USAID agency 63, 67, 89

'The Valiant Venture,' TIME magazine 40
Vattenfall company 49–56
Veaudry, Karina 151–2
Veeran, Jonathan 33–4
Velez, Alvaro Uribe 180–3
Veloza, Hebert (H. H.) 181
Ver.di trade union, Germany 101
Vernon, Raymond, Sovereignty at Bay 173
Vieira, Luiz 76
Vienna 172
Vietnam 139–40, 142–3, 147, 149–50, 174–5
Hanoi 147–50
Vietnam War 141, 173
Villa Veranda housing community 72–4
Viner, Jacob 216 violence 2, 11–12, 15, 17, 96, 144, 170, 175–7, 179–80, 182–8, 190–1, 206 murders 180–1, 186, 201 against Palestinians 189–91 of paramilitary group 177–88
Violence Policy Center 201
Vogel, David 174
von Mises, Ludwig 172

Wainwright, Hilary 173 walkway-podway systems 152
Wallace, Terry 212
Wal-mart 89, 100–2, 104, 169
Walter, Natasha 202
Warsaw Pact, Soviet Union's 103
Warsaw School of Economics 104
Warsaw Uprising (1944) 103
Washington Consensus policy 76, 171
Watchguard International 205 water resources 10, 12, 14–16, 20, 49, 51–3, 55, 73, 77–8, 91, 99, 146–7, 149, 151, 157, 163, 165, 192, 197, 211, 217 weapon contracts 200–2, 214
Weber, Max 166, 205–6
Weinberger, Caspar 211
Welch, Jenny 151

Wen Ho Lee 211
Wen Jiabao 130
West Africa 70, 93, 131
Westminster Security 207
WikiLeaks 1–2, 116, 181
Williamson mine, northern Tanzania 79–80
Win, Keith 117–20
Women for Refugee Women NGO 202
Woods, George D. 45–6
World Association of Investment Promotion Agencies (WAIPA) 122
World Bank 3, 10–11, 13, 15–16, 18–19, 22, 24–6, 30, 32, 35–7, 39, 41–2, 44–5, 47, 49–53, 57, 62, 74–80, 94–7, 99, 103, 106–9, 112, 115, 121, 132, 141, 160–3, 171, 186, 192, 221
  IFC (see International Finance Corporation (IFC))
  Independent Evaluation Group 96 on inequality among Mauritians 160–1
  Oxfam's accusation against 163
  US-controlled IBRD 94
World Commercial Court 170
World Development Movement 67
World Economic Forum 87, 122, 173
World Investment Bank 170
World's Fair 'Century of Progress' exposition (1933) 170
World Trade Organization 36, 172

Yackee, Jason 44
Yakovlev, Andrei 27
Yarl's Wood 202
Yesh Din 189
Yohannes, Daniel 83

Zanchetta, Marco 195–6
Zemin, Jiang 130–1
Zengerling, Cathrin 53
Zhang, Douglas 123
Zimmer 127